Engineering an Iron Dome

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Rocket scientists have a reputation for being cerebral, of being able to wrap their considerable mental powers around mathematically challenging problems.

That's certainly true for "D," an engineer for Raphael Advanced Defense Systems who played a key role in the development of Israel's Iron Dome missile defence system.

But D, who asks that his name not be used due to concerns over his safety, is also a man of faith. He wears a knitted kippah and quotes Halachah in connection to the formidable changes Iron Dome has occasioned in the lives of ordinary Israelis.

"I am very religious," D said in a meeting with members of the press. "God works in Iron Dome. Iron Dome is the way that God works in which to save us."

D was in Toronto last week as part of an extensive speaking tour. He said the system is helping save "Am Yisrael [the people of Israel] and that's helping God out."

The CJN interviews the project manager instrumental in developing Israel's anti-missile defence system

Of course, he continued, people have to help themselves as well, and for him, it was particularly gratifying to see Israelis "get it done quickly." Impetus for the Iron Dome system, which tracks, targets and shoots down short-range rockets and shells, came as a result of the 2006 war with Hezbollah, after thousands of rockets rained down on northern Israel.

"Our backyard was on fire," D said. "There were people being injured, killed... When that happens, you work differently."

CANADA

Harper Feted

OTTAWA — Russian Canadian Broadcasting (RCB) has selected Prime Minister Stephen Harper as its "Man of the Year" for his "continued dedication to the promotion of democracy, human rights and the rule of law." RCB will present the award on Jan. 7. Founded in 1993 by Russian expatriates, RCB operates the television program MIXTV, the newspaper Nasha Gazeta and the radio program Intersection.

Saturday Opening

WINNIPEG — The Rady Jewish Community Centre (JCC) is extending its Saturday hours of operation as of Jan. 12, opening its doors at 8 a.m. Fitness classes, swimming lessons and other services will be offered in the morning, although there will be no exchange of money, the JCC stated. The change puts the JCC in line with similar community centres across Canada. The Rady JCC currently opens at 2 p.m. on Saturdays.

WORLD

Klugman Dies

LOS ANGELES — Actor Jack Klugman, who made up the sloppy half in the popular Odd Couple, has died at 90. Klugman, who also starred in the original film version of 12 Angry Men, won two Emmy Awards for his portrayal of messy and careless New York sportswriter Oscar Madison. He also performed in the original Broadway production as a replacement for Walter Matthau. Klugman went on to star in the television series Quincy, M.E. in which he played a medical examiner.

Artifacts Excavated

JERUSALEM — Archeologists with the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) have unearthed artifacts dating from the First Temple period. A nearly 3,000-year-old temple was found at the Tel Motza archeological site a few kilometres west of Jerusalem. "The ritual building at Tel Motza is an unusual and striking find, in light of the fact that there are hardly any remains of ritual buildings of the period in Judea at the time of the First Temple," said Anna Eirikh, Hamoudi Khalaily and Shua Kisilevitz, directors of the excavation on behalf of the IAA, in a statement. Among the artifacts are pottery vessels with fragments of chalices that were used in sacred rituals, decorated ritual pedestals and a number of pottery figurines.

Cotler Urges Legal Action Against Iran

STOCKHOLM — MP Irwin Cotler called on the international community to hold Iran to account for its state-sanctioned incitement to genocide and its violations of the human rights of the Iranian people.

Speaking at a conference marking the 100th birthday of Holocaust-era diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, the former Canadian justice minister also called on the Swedish government to join other democracies in initiating legal measures against Iran.

In a wide-ranging address, Cotler urged Sweden to sign the Ottawa Protocol to Combat Antisemitism, which was adopted by 150 parliamentarians from more than 50 countries. The protocol serves as a blueprint for parliamentary, governmental and citizen action to address antisemitism.

Cotler, who once chaired the International Commission on the Fate and Whereabouts of Raoul Wallenberg, also called on the government of Russia to "open up the blank spots of history and disclose the truth of Wallenberg's fate. The smoking gun is somewhere in Russia's archives."

Tourism Increases

JERUSALEM — Some 3.5 million people visited Israel during 2012 – a four per cent increase over 2011, according to Israel's Ministry of Tourism. The United States is the largest single source country for incoming tourism with about 610,000 visitors, four per cent less than in 2011. Tourism from Russia was second with 590,000 visitors, 20 per cent more than 2011. Revenue is about $4.6 billion (U.S.), an increase of eight per cent.

Haifa U hopes for a checkmate

University hopes to keep Israel on top in chess

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The University of Haifa is working on a project to perpetuate Israel's extraordinarily strong position in chess.

The Grandmaster Chess Research Project, currently in its fundraising phase, will be launched once sufficient funds are available.

Initiated by Aaron Ben-Zeev, the university's former president, the project is being created in collaboration with Boris Gelfand, an Israeli grandmaster and winner of the 2009 World Cup.

Its objectives are three-fold: to determine the connection between chess and cognitive development; to develop the first Hebrew-language educational software for teaching chess in schools and kindergarten, and to establish an international program for training chess instructors and coaches.

"This initiative is introducing chess and the disciplines in the game's development into the academic world," said Michael Yerushalmy, the university's vice-president and dean of research.

"It will provide an opportunity to achieve breakthrough research and social outreach in a field that has not yet been fully explored. We are well-positioned to examine the impact of chess on students' math skills, language acquisition and other skills."

Shay Bushinsky, a chess software developer who's playing a role in the project, said the skills of chess can advance social knowledge.

"Chess has many advantages in developing social skills, especially in young children," noted Bushinsky, who teaches computer science courses at Haifa U and Tel Aviv University.

"In general, chess teaches patience, coping with winning and losing and paying respect to an opponent."

Among the elderly, the relationship between chess and cognitive enhancement is clear, he added.

"It has been empirically shown to preserve critical skills such as memory and calculation. Chess players must cope with time pressure and carry the burden of precise attack and defence planning, which require a robust decision-making process."

'Better a bitter conclusion'

From the editor's desk...

The new year begins with an old story: Israel's ability defend itself so well is upsetting to some people.

Thomas Friedman, in a Dec. 5 New York Times column, and Scott Wilson, in the Washington Post on Dec. 9, bemoan what they perceive as adverse implications from Israel's highly effective Iron Dome anti-missile system.

"The wall [security barrier] plus the dome are enabling Israel's leaders to abdicate their responsibility for thinking creatively about a resolution of its own majority-minority problem with the Palestinians in the West Bank and east Jerusalem," wrote Friedman. "I am glad," he meekly adds, "that the wall and the Iron Dome are sheltering Israelis from enemies who wish to do them ill." However, he does not budge from his central opinion: "But I fear the wall and the Iron Dome are also blinding them from truths they still badly need to face."

Wilson echoed Friedman's worries. Neither, however, wrote a word about the effect of Palestinian policies on the peace process.

Many people responded to this absurd Friedman/Wilson line of thinking. Leo Rennert, Washington bureau chief for McClatchy Newspapers, and Barry Rubin, director of the Global Research in International Affairs Center in Herzliya, were the most effective. Their responses appeared in the American Thinker blog and in the Rubin Reports blog, respectively.

But perhaps the best response of all to Friedman and Wilson came from Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion.

On March 4, 1958, Ben-Gurion delivered an in camera assessment to members of his party, Mapai (Workers' Party of Israel), of the country's political situation in the world.

The wise and wizened prime minister reported on and analyzed the Jewish state's relations with various countries and regions in the world. The first part of his report dealt with Israel's prospects for peace with its Arab neighbours. His remarks were reproduced in the spring edition of The Jerusalem Quarterly, 1984.

"So, after I had gained some experience in this matter [how the Arabs regard the Jews in the Land of Israel] 25 years ago, I went to the Arabs of Palestine and to their leaders, to Musa Alami, to Awni Abd al-Hadi, to George Antonius and later to leaders in the neighbouring countries, to [Syrian leader] Jamal Mardam, to [Lebanese leader] Riyad al-Sulh, to Ibn Saud's emissary, to the [Syrian-Palestinian] Arab committee in Geneva, and I met with them in London at the [1939] St. James Palace Conference convened by Malcolm MacDonald [the British colonial secretary]. There we met with all these Arab countries. Before that they had not wanted to sit with us. Malcolm MacDonald made a great effort to arrange a meeting; the Arabs of Palestine remained adamant in their refusal. So we met only with Arab rulers of neighbouring countries, with the rulers of Iraq, Egypt and Saudi Arabia [Lebanon and Syria were still under French Mandate at that time].

"I thus came to a bitter conclusion: at this time there is no prospect of a Jewish-Arab peace…

"I cannot forget how when [American journalist J.] Alsop entered my office in the Prime Minister's Bureau and saw the map on the wall, he asked: 'How will you survive?'

"Only afterward does the question arise: is there any prospect of peace? I believe that the two questions are intertwined. Only the forces that help us survive may bring about a situation in which the Arabs are forced to acknowledge that we cannot be annihilated; and it is my profound belief that peace cannot be reached without the Arabs first recognizing that there is no possibility of annihilating us. (My emphasis) Since this is the only way to peace, concern for our survival and for our strengthening becomes the true concern for peace."

Ben-Gurion's conclusion still stands today, some 54 years after he spoke them. And no one can say of Ben-Gurion that he was a maximalist in any respect in his approach to seeking peace with the Arabs.

The reason his conclusion still stands today is quite simple, although it appears to have escaped Friedman and Wilson. Palestinian leaders have not changed their thinking since 1939. They simply refuse to accommodate a State of Israel alongside a State of Palestine.

Even if we only look at the record since 1993, the evidence is overwhelming and inescapable. Former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat and current PA President Mahmoud Abbas turned their backs on the various Israeli prime ministers who sat with them, negotiated, bargained and pleaded for a treaty of peace between the two peoples. (And it must be added, Arafat and Abbas sat with them while even Jews were building homes, roads, schools and communities in the West Bank.)

The extent to which individuals such as Friedman and Wilson are willing to ignore history, distort logic and undermine values of decency and morality in order to indict Israel is a sorrowful commentary on the place of truth in modern political discourse – at least when it comes to Israel.

The last word must go, again, to Ben-Gurion.

"Better a bitter conclusion which is the truth than sweet-seeming self-deception." – MBD

DRESSMAKERS ON STRIKE: Women picket for better wages, union recognition and impartial arbitration during the Dressmakers General Strike of 1931, which was organized by the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU). This was a time when low wages, long hours and hazardous working conditions were the norm, striking was a common part of the working-class experience, the Russian Revolution and other political developments influenced a new generation and Spadina Avenue was the focal point of Jewish working-class life. Rabbi's contract not renewed at Beth Radom

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Beth Radom Congregation is facing a period of healing following a decision by its board not to renew Rabbi Steven Schonblum's contract after it expires next July and after an unsuccessful challenge by a group of members seeking to replace the board and overturn its decision.

A Dec. 6 letter from the board to congregants explaining the decision regarding the rabbi alleged "unauthorized" conversions and "poor decisions" in managing his discretionary fund, both of which placed the Toronto shul at risk, according to the letter.

Following a Dec. 16 special meeting and congregational vote, the board emailed congregants to say that a motion asking for the board to resign was defeated. As well, the letter asked for co-operation to "ensure that our community not only heals but thrives."

In an initial letter to congregants dated Oct. 22, the board announced that it would not renew Rabbi Schonblum's contract, but it didn't specifically say why, citing concern for his privacy.

The letter said, however, that there had been "ongoing contractual issues" over the past several years. It added that the matters were serious and documented, and there had been discussions with the rabbi, as well as attempts to remedy the situation.

In its Dec. 6 follow-up letter, the board explained its decision regarding the rabbi, who since 2001 has been spiritual leader at Beth Radom, an unaffiliated Conservative egalitarian synagogue with 350 families.

A former ritual director of Pride of Israel Synagogue, Rabbi Schonblum received his smichah shortly before he joined Beth Radom, at age 40, after a decade of study in a distance learning program run by Tifereth Yisrael Rabbinical Yeshiva, which is Orthodox and based in Long Island, N.Y.

According to the board's Dec. 6 letter, "numerous" complaints, dating back to 2009, had been received from congregants about Rabbi Schonblum, who nevertheless was described as "an extremely likeable and personable individual."

The complaints related to his availability and responsiveness to members' needs, including shivah visits, visiting the sick and returning phone calls and emails; use of Internet content for sermons without attribution, and unresponsiveness to the board of governors.

Most notably, the board said the rabbi's conversions "placed the shul at serious risk for liability," and that his management of the rabbi's discretionary fund placed Beth Radom's status as a charitable organization at risk.

The board said he used synagogue letterhead for conversion certificates after he was asked not to, and was "unable or unwilling to demonstrate that informed consent had been provided" regarding the limitations of his conversions.

Beth Radom Congregation's sanctuary

Jordan Cait, a vice-president of Beth Radom, told The CJN that the board's priorities right now are "healing, and to listen to the congregation, and to have them participate with the transition committee that we're forming to help set the direction in finding a new rabbi."

Because of the controversy, some congregants have withheld their dues, leading to financial difficulties for the synagogue.

A Dec. 11 letter from the five people who challenged the board – Symon Zucker, Sidney Zucker, Howie Meyer, Wendy Melvin, and Risa Veffer – blamed the board and its actions for what it called the "current financial crisis at the shul."

Cait, however, described the situation in an interview as "a seasonal cash-flow problem" and "now that the situation is over and the new year is upon us, we're asking congregants to pay their dues."

In its letter, the dissident group offered explanations for the accusations directed at Rabbi Schonblum.

The group said, for example, that alleged wrongdoings with respect to the rabbi's discretionary fund had been authorized by the board, and that the rabbi had in fact complied with other requests regarding his sermons and conversions.

They also wrote that the congregational vote was not the one they had requested. They said they had asked for separate votes about the future of the current board and the renewal of the rabbi's contract.

A majority of two-thirds in the membership vote would have been required to override the board's decision and have current board members resign.

Symon Zucker, a former board member whose father was a founder of the shul, said that a little more than half the votes were in favour of the board's resignation. There were 134 opting for the petition, with 126 against, and 17 abstentions.

Cait views the results differently. He said the board had told some undecided members that by abstaining they would be voting for the board.

Zucker told The CJN he will stay at the shul. "We're not a dictatorship. We abide by the constitution. There's an election coming up next November. We'll address it again."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation, said that Rabbi Schonblum is not a member of his group, which comprises members from all the main Jewish movements, and that he could not comment on his particular case.

He added that he didn't know whether Rabbi Schonblum had ever applied to join the TBR, and he did not recall ever having received a complaint about him.

But speaking about Conservative conversions, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said that "Conservative rabbis, generally speaking, utilize the Beit Din, or rabbinic court, of the [Conservative movement's] Rabbinical Assembly, and all of those conversions are conducted under what I'll call a fairly consistent model. And occasionally, there will be Conservative rabbis who for different reasons will convene their own beit din. In those cases, the beit din is usually three rabbis, but might include a non-rabbi as a member."

Toronto man still fit as he turns 100

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

"It's not easy getting older, but there's still a lot of pleasure in life," says Yitzak Eisenberg who turns 100 this week.

In an interview, the centenarian said the things that helped him along the way are "my beloved family, exercise, playing cards and a lot of determination."

Eisenberg was born in Radom, Poland, on Jan. 6, 1913, and worked as a tailor. When there was no work for him in Radom, he moved to Lodz in 1933.

In 1939, with thousands of other Jews, he fled to the Russian border, where he had to sign up for hard labour to get into the country. In Siberia, he worked with some 20,000 other Jews in a factory in Magnitogorsk, an industrial mining town that supported the war industry.

"I pretended that I was sick and had a pain in my chest," he recalled. "They gave me four weeks off. I was very fearful as my brother was accused of being a spy and was assassinated." His brother was later exonerated, he added.

Through a chance meeting with a woman who knew his brother, he was able to get a job as a tailor, making clothes for the people working in the factory.

Although the work was not difficult, "I lived in fear day and night. I was afraid I would be accused of something as my brother had been."

After the war, Eisenberg did not want to return to Poland because of the antisemitism. He found his way to Stuttgart, Germany, where he applied to go to America with his wife, Channah (Frenkiel).

He arrived in Canada in 1946 and thought that Canada was America – the United States. "But it turned out for the best, as my father's sister lived in Toronto," he said with a smile. "I was really born in 1946 when I arrived in Canada."

Over the next few decades, Eisenberg tried some different ventures – working as a tailor, at a dry cleaners, in a furniture store, in pickle importing, as a real estate agent and in the building business.

An entrepreneur, he admitted that he had a lot of courage and foresight and always had a vision for improving his life.

In the early 1960s, Eisenberg's desire to remain strong and healthy began. "I joined Vic Tanny's gym and bought a life membership for $18."

He said that around that time, he also began playing cards to keep his mind sharp.

When he retired at age 65, Eisenberg began swimming an hour every day and working out on the resistance machines.

At 85, although he was fit, he needed bypass surgery. The doctors did not want to operate at his age. He told the doctors not to judge him by his age. "I am fit and I want the operation," he told them.

"And I've gone on to live 15 more vital years."

At 93, he joined the Columbus Centre Gym, and four years later, they gave him a free lifetime membership.

Yitzak Eisenberg

Eisenberg has two children, Morty Eisenberg and Helene Smagala, six grandchildren and is expecting their first great-grandchild.

Although Eisenberg has macular degeneration and is legally blind, he walks a mile at the Columbus Centre and continues to use the resistance machines.

His daughter, Helene, told The CJN that her father is "a fearlessly and independent man. He continues to take the bus to his appointments and continues to do whatever he can."

Eisenberg will celebrate his 100th birthday at a party at the Columbus Centre on Jan. 6, where 150 guests, including seven family members from Israel, will toast the centenarian.

Bar-Ilan expert on Arab political discourse to visit

Western analysts often 'oblivious' about Mideast, says Kedar

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Mordechai Kedar doesn't come right out and say most Mideast analysts in western countries are completely out of their depth, but that's pretty much the upshot of his position.

Very few of them speak the indigenous languages of the region, such as Arabic or Farsi, so they can't read important documents that reveal what people really believe. And when they visit the area, they interact with western-oriented intellectuals and media representatives who share their values. They only see "a very thin layer of local societies" and as a result, they don't really understand the forces at play. "The West is oblivious about the facts of the Middle East," he said.

Kedar, a scholar at Israel's Bar-Ilan University and an expert on Arab political discourse, will visit Toronto in late January as part of a month-long North American visit and lecture tour.

Mordechai Kedar

Kedar said the Arab world is experiencing massive convulsions as "oppressed masses for decades burst onto the streets to break the fear and chains and take out dictators… The imported ideologies of the West – patriotism, secularism, liberalism – went bankrupt in the Middle East, as they are not indigenous to the local cultures."

"In the Middle East, the culture is Islamism on one side and tribalism on the other side. Those will shape the Middle East."

Kedar, a research associate of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies, said people in the region relate to each other by family ties, language and land, and they maintain fighting militias to promote their own interests. "They don't mingle with other groups, and when they take over, they use the state to dominate other tribes, which fight for survival."

He criticized western observers for failing to realize Middle Eastern and Asian societies are fractured on tribal and ethnic lines. Afghanistan, for one, is "a failed state of 11 ethnic groups that don't share language, mindset, traditions, behavior, nothing. Nobody can expect they'll cooperate in anything. There is no Afghani people."

Likewise Iraq, with its Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish areas, while Yemen and Syria are tribal societies with no overarching national identity, he stated.

His analysis of the fractured nature of Middle Eastern societies applies to the Palestinians as well, he said. Palestinian society is based on clan and tribal ties, but it's represented on the international stage by "intellectuals with no relevance to Palestinian society."

Their bid for statehood through the UN "will lead nowhere, as a Palestinian state will be another failed Arab state, as local tribes won't let it function."

Palestinian tribes dominate individual West Bank cities "and they don't trust each other. They will become another Syria or Libya," he said.

Peace will only come when Palestinians fragment into homogenous city-states, following "the Gulf paradigm," which he called an "eight-state solution."

Kedar, who gained international celebrity when a spirited 2008 Arab-language interview on Al-Jazeera about the Jewishness of Jerusalem went viral, said the United States is making "the basic mistake of judging and evaluating societies in the Mideast with western-mindset and western values, which are totally irrelevant in the Middle East. Whatever is sacred in the West is profane in the Middle East."

Freedom of religion, a cornerstone of western civilization, "is viewed in the Middle East as totally unacceptable." Muslims who seek to abandon Islam face decapitation, he said.

Other western freedoms, such as behaving as you like or choosing your spouse, are a "totally unacceptable way of thinking" in the Middle East. "The virginity [of young women] is sacred, and if a young lady behaves too liberally, she will be slaughtered by her family for bringing shame to the family," he said.

As for minority rights, "ask the Copts how Egyptians honour minority rights," he stated.

Even the concept of peace has a different meaning in the Middle East, he continued. "According to the West, peace is the normal relations between two states that recognize each other's sovereignty and independence. In Islam, there is no peace between states. Between Islamic states and infidel states, there is no peace. Peace can be only between communities that live under Muslim [hegemony] and behave under sharia law."

Truces of unlimited duration are the best outcome Israel can expect. However, in the Islamic tradition a truce can be broken when the Islamic country becomes powerful enough to overwhelm its infidel foe. "As long as Israel is invincible, this temporary peace can last. Once Israel is viewed as vulnerable, that peace will be over. Israel can have temporary peace forever as long as it remains invincible."

Kedar praised the Harper government for standing by Israel and making it appear more powerful. He criticized the United States for "encouraging Islamists who try to topple Israel and [who] see a U.S. president not supporting Israel as fully as presidents in the past… Unfortunately [President Barack] Obama works against peace. He does not understand that.

"In the Middle East, whoever asks for peace is viewed as weak and the weak is chased out of the club. The Mideast club is only for those who are strong," he said.

Strengthen our unity

The monthly ritual at the Western Wall has now become a melodrama of political theatre. The Women of the Wall bring prayer shawls, some bring tfillin, to their court-designated location at the Western Wall for the prayers ushering in the new month. But the women are prohibited – by a decision of the rabbinic establishment and sanctioned by the Israeli Supreme Court – from wearing prayer shawls, for the shawl is considered by that rabbinic establishment to be halachically forbidden to women.

And thus, the police, some enthusiastically, some quite embarrassed, are compelled to enforce the law by confiscating the women's prayer shawls and detaining the women intent on wearing the shawls on suspicion of "disturbing public order."

The real underlying issue is less theological than it is political, namely, who is to set the rules for prayer and Jewish ritual congress in Israel's public spaces.

Given the historical, religious, national and emotional significance of so many of Israel's public spaces – especially the Western Wall – to the entirety of the Jewish People, the question can no longer be considered "merely" an internal domestic issue within Israel.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu understands this. A public policy that does not also somehow accommodate non-Orthodox rituals of prayer at the Western Wall alienates millions of Jews who consider themselves excluded because their way in the Jewish faith is not that of Israel's rabbinate.

Thus the prime minister last week asked Jewish Agency chairman Natan Sharansky to find a way that does accommodate non-Orthodox prayer at the Wall.

Despite the hold on Jewish religious institutions in Israel by the haredi establishment, there are encouraging signs that changes may not be too far off. As reported in the Jerusalem Post, two leading non-haredi Orthodox rabbis have expressed support for accommodating non-Orthodox prayer at the Western Wall.

Rabbi Yuval Cherlow, dean of the Hesder Yeshiva in Petah Tikva, told the Jerusalem Post last week that "Jerusalem is at the heart of the Jewish People, and if we want all of the Jewish People to feel connected there, then we need to find a place for all parts of the Jewish People at the Western Wall."

Rabbi Benny Lau said the fact that only Orthodox worshippers feel at home at the Western Wall is damaging to the Jewish people and that the "sectoralization" of the site "distances other Jews from their heritage."

As Netanyahu himself noted when he instructed Sharansky to undertake this new important task, "the Western Wall must remain a source of Jewish unity rather than division."

The unity – not uniformity – of the Jewish People has been one of the millennial cords binding us together in common moral commitment through the long years of history. We must do our utmost to buttress that unity, not undermine it.

We commend Netanyahu for this initiative.

Women and the Wall (1)

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein suggests that in order to resolve the recent conflict in Israel with the Women of the Wall, the Israeli government should "remove the Kotel's 'religious' designation... and declare it a public site under the Ministry of Antiquities... and then disallow any minyan of any denomination to pray there" ("Provoking change at the Wall," Nov. 22). This solution is reminiscent of the ruse suggested by King Solomon to reveal the true mother of the baby in the famous court case recorded in the Tanach. Two women come to claim a baby, and King Solomon has to decide which one is the real mother. The malingering woman is willing to cut the baby in half so that each woman can have a piece, and therefore be "equal." Why would a rabbi propose a plan that would deny any minyanim to pray at the Kotel, the holiest site in our tradition? The answer is obvious: her agenda is a political one that is focused on a misguided notion of equality, wherein religious significance and values are first ignored and then pushed aside entirely.

In her column, "Provoking change at the Wall," (Nov. 22), Rabbi Elyse Goldstein quotes a highly placed Israeli official in Ottawa who says that "Israel is an Orthodox country." If this is so, perhaps the Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist congregations in the Diaspora should act accordingly by withdrawing their generous funding for our Jewish state.

Not allowing women to congregate and pray publicly is a disgrace to the Jewish People who have prided themselves in human rights and social justice. Rabbi Goldstein's suggestion – to remove the Wall's religious designation and declare it a public site under the Ministry of Antiquities, so all denominations can pray comfortably – seems very sound. God created Adam and Eve to share this Earth. Surely Israeli soil surrounding the Wall can accommodate both genders with equality.

Settlement construction

Former Israel ambassador to Canada Alan Baker needs to be reminded about what the Israeli government agreed to through past UN Security Council resolutions. ("The Palestinian UN upgrade: setting things straight," Dec. 13). To date, among the numerous UN Security Council adopted resolutions, the most important now of relevance to this issue are resolutions 242 (1968) and 1515 (2003), which was endorsed by the "road map" peace plan (2002). The Palestinian Authority fulfilled most of its "road map" obligations, but Israel has not fulfilled a major component that states the "government of Israel freezes all settlement activity consistent with the Mitchell Report, including natural growth of settlements," while conducting sincere direct bilateral talks between the PA and the Israeli government. Therefore, it's clearly articulated that settlement construction, which entails planning for future construction projects as well, must stop during peace talks. This is really not debatable anymore.

Con man on Toronto subway

I was hoping to make your readers aware of a con man who is riding the Toronto subways. One Sunday morning, as I sat in the St. Clair West subway station, looking over my Torah trope, a man sat down beside me and we began to chat. Who would have thought my photocopied pages of Hebrew text made me an easy mark. I heard about his wife, who had just had heart surgery, his five children in Israel, his parents who were killed in the war, and his bakery in Jerusalem. And through our discussions I learned that his wife required medication. He had only shekels, and his credit card was not working in Canada.

After I gave him several hundred dollars Canadian, he explained that the money would be returned to me the next day, when he was back in Israel. He didn't return the money to me. I generally try to help people when I can. This man should know that because of my experience, I am wary of helping people. I wanted to warn your readers and hopefully shame him for what he is doing.

The 'day-after' scenario in Syria

Jonathan D. Halevi

The moment of truth is approaching in Syria. In an interview with the Lebanese daily al-Akhbar, published on Dec. 7, Syria's vice-president, Farouq Shara, admitted for the first time that the war against the Syrian rebels could not be won: "I do not believe that what the security forces and the army units are doing will achieve a decisive victory."

The rebel forces, led by allied jihadist groups, have the upper hand on the battlefield and scored significant achievements when they took over a large military base in Aleppo well stocked with weapons and ammunition, and later in fierce fighting in communities surrounding the capital city of Damascus including the Yarmouk Palestinian refugee camp. The Free Syrian Army is now claiming to have gained control of most of the air defence bases in the Damascus Governate.

Bashar Assad's regime is fighting a rearguard battle and has already lost control over large parts of the country, which are still being subjected to aerial and artillery attacks by Syrian army forces still loyal to the regime. Assad continues to draw his strength from the Alawite community, which forms the backbone of the army, and from the political, military, and economic assistance he receives from Russia, Syria, Iran, and Hezbollah. The latter two have also sent forces to help with the fighting, both in advisory and operational capacities.

The sense that the end is approaching was expressed by Russian deputy foreign minister Mikhail Bogdanov, who acknowledged that Assad's regime is losing control of the country and a rebel takeover may be imminent. While Russia has not changed its policy on the official level, it, too, appears prepared to safeguard its interests should the regime collapse.

A political turning point occurred when the United States recognized the Syrian National Coalition as the sole and exclusive representative of the Syrian people. The United States and other western countries, as well as the bloc of Arab and Muslim states that support the rebels, have an interest in building up a national leadership that can unite the rebel forces under its command and serve as a legitimate temporary government, thereby ensuring a stable transition period and the continued geographic and governmental coherence of Syria.

With the Syrian crisis entering its final stage, what follows are the main implications.

To begin with, Assad's regime has long since lost its legitimacy to rule and at most can survive for a further period through the growing use of firepower that is meant to inflict large-scale casualties among the rebels and the civilian population that supports them.

The rebels' takeover of large parts of Aleppo will likely precipitate a final collapse of the army's rule in the area. This will add momentum to similar processes in northern Syria, further enabling the mobilization and organization of forces for the decisive battle in Damascus – if the campaign being waged at present does not achieve a breakthrough.

In attacking rebel forces and the Syrian population, the Syrian army has seen fit to use all the weapons in its arsenal, except for chemical weapons. Strong messages on this issue from the United States and other western countries, indicating that the use of such weapons will prompt western military intervention expressly aimed at toppling the regime, have acted as a deterrent.

It is unlikely under the prevailing circumstances that Assad's regime believes the use of chemical weapons can restore the previous situation in Syria, even if very heavy losses are inflicted on the civilian population. It appears probable that, should Damascus soon fall into rebel hands, the regime will instead seek to transfer most of the surviving loyal forces and strategic (including chemical) weaponry to the area of the Alawite enclave in the west of the country. These weapons would then serve as a deterrent to acts of revenge and a political card for ensuring the Alawite community's status in a future Syrian order.

The Syrian National Coalition has indeed won international recognition and projects a moderate image for the Syrian opposition. The reality, however, is much more complex. The rebel forces regard the new leadership of the opposition as having been imposed on them and are prepared at most to accept it as a temporary actor that can mobilize the international support needed to complete the endeavour of toppling the regime.

In actuality, the dominant forces in Syria are the military frameworks that have waged the campaign against the regime since the revolution erupted in March 2011. These military frameworks, which enjoy great popular support, will likely demand their part in the new government and make their imprint on the shaping of the new Syria.

An analysis of the fighting forces' ideological underpinnings shows that the overwhelming majority, if not all, espouse an Islamist, jihadist, Salafist outlook in different degrees of fervour. Their common denominator is a desire to establish a new Syria that is ruled by the Sunni Muslim majority and defines itself first and foremost as an Islamic state.

The Jahbat al-Nusra organization, which is identified with the Iraqi branch of Al Qaeda, is considered one of the most powerful forces among the rebels and enjoys extensive popular sympathy both because of its battlefield achievements and the aid it provides to the population. A few days after the United States decided to add it to the list of terrorist organizations, there were mass demonstrations of support for the organization in Syria in the name of all the fighting forces, under the banner: "There Is No Terror in Syria But Assad's Terror."

Despite its international connections, even the Syrian National Coalition rejected the U.S. decision to classify Jabhat al-Nusra as a terrorist organization. This full backing for a branch of Al Qaeda against the United States and the West likely indicates the future direction of the Syrian revolution, which appears ready to adopt Islamism as the main basis of the government that will replace the Assad regime.

Under the surface in Syria, two major Islamic forces are active: the Muslim Brotherhood via Turkey, and Hizb ut-Tahrir, which calls for the immediate creation of an Islamic caliphate. Officially, the Muslim Brotherhood has no fighting forces acting under its name. According to testimonies, however, some of the semi-military frameworks set up over the past two years are identified with the movement, and it controls numerous sources of financial aid from the Gulf states and thereby wields influence among the rebel forces. The Brotherhood is likely to take a higher profile after the revolution achieves its ends, and to strive, with the help of Turkey and Egypt, to unite all the Islamic factions under its leadership.

The overriding goal of the new regime, with Turkey's support, will be to maintain Syria's geographic coherence and prevent its division on an ethnic/religious (Sunni, Alawite, Kurdish, and Druze) basis. So far the rebel forces, except for specific acts of vengeance, have avoided massacres of the Alawite population. They want to leave an escape hatch for Alawite officers and soldiers who will encourage others to desert, thereby hastening the army's collapse. Such restraint will not necessarily remain after the regime falls, with not a few voices among the rebels already calling for retribution. One possible solution for the new situation is an eventual Syrian federation that would extend limited autonomous rights to the minority groups.

The revolution in Syria has greatly depleted the Syrian army. The rebel forces, for their part, are hostile to Israel and reiterate calls to extend the jihad from Damascus to the liberation of Jerusalem. At present, all their resources are directed at overthrowing the Assad regime. After that is accomplished, a potential military-terrorist threat to Israel will likely emerge in the transition period, which will be marked by governmental instability and a lack of central control over at least some of the fighting forces. The jihadist forces in Syria have taken over the Syrian military's stocks of weapons, as in the Libyan case after the fall of Moammar Gadhafi. This could pose a serious security challenge to western interests in the future.

The fall of Assad, Tehran's close ally, will be a harsh blow to Iran's interests in the Middle East and could cause further shockwaves that weaken Iran's influence even more. That pertains particularly to the Lebanese arena, where the Sunni Islamist forces are already organizing for the day after Assad's fall in a push to alter Lebanon's political and military balance of power, in which Hezbollah is now dominant. The collapse of the Syrian hinterland will likely spark violent clashes that could escalate to a civil war in Lebanon between the radical Sunni forces and Hezbollah. In Iraq, which has been under increasing Iranian domination after the U.S. withdrawal, Iraqi Sunnis will likely look to their Sunni allies in a post-Assad Syria in order to renew the insurgency campaign against the Shiite-led government in Baghdad.

At present, the rebel forces view Iran, Russia, and China as partners in crime for fully backing the Assad regime. It is, however, undoubtedly possible that ties with them will be rehabilitated in the longer term. Russia has a major interest in maintaining its influence in Syria and will likely play the card of banishment of Assad and his comrades in trying to pave a path to the rebels' hearts. Although the animosity toward Iran has an ideological basis, the Muslim Brotherhood has shown that it ascribed supreme strategic importance to relations with Iran even while massacres were being perpetrated in Syria. The common interest is to counter western influence in the Middle East and build a front against Israel. These considerations are likely to guide the new regime in Damascus.

Our struggle for religious pluralism in Israel

Spending time away from your usual surroundings sometimes gives you a better appreciation of where you're from and where you plan to continue life's journey.

In November, I spent almost three weeks in North America, mostly in Canada. Speaking at Reform congregations and schools in Toronto and Southern Ontario, as well as in Montreal, I was a guest of ARZA Canada, "the Zionist voice of the Canadian Reform movement."

I came away with a deeper awareness of Reform Jews' devotion to Israel (and that of Canadian Jews in general), but also of their legitimate concerns and frustrations regarding ongoing trends in Israel, particularly in matters of synagogue and state. The lack of any genuine state recognition for liberal, egalitarian strains of Judaism in the Jewish state rightfully exasperates them, as it does like-minded Israelis, myself included, who consider themselves liberal Jews. The enduring Orthodox monopoly on anything religious in Israel is infuriating, alienating millions of Jews around the globe.

My message to the people I spoke to was that we must broaden and deepen our partnership, using the strengths we have on both sides of the Atlantic to endeavour together to achieve a much more religiously pluralistic Israel. Many of us here are willing to work on expanding liberal Judaism around the country, encouraging more sabras to join us and fighting the legal and other battles necessary to succeed.

Our brethren in the Diaspora, particularly in North America, should support us, and not only financially. Because of their sheer numbers, they ought to use the leverage at their disposal to pressure our government into making the changes necessary to make Israel a place where all Jews feel at home.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

On a more personal level, while in Canada, I had several experiences that helped me better understand my roots, but also where I am today.

It always amazes me how easily I fit back into Toronto, where I spent most of my childhood. Getting into a car at Pearson International Airport, I can still navigate the highways and byways and enjoy seeing places central to my past – houses I lived in, schools and shuls I spent much time in, not to mention restaurants, stores and malls, streets and neighbourhoods, as well as wonderful family and friends who are still very much part of my life.

On this trip, I spent enough time in the city to also realize again what a wonderful Jewish community Toronto has and how one can live a genuinely rich Jewish existence there.

But a couple of incidents also helped me recognize some other things. After one of my talks, I was chatting with some of those present when someone asked, "How is it to be back home?" My initial reaction was to look over my shoulder, certain the question had been addressed to someone behind me. When I realized I was the one being asked, I responded in no uncertain terms (and I hope not impolitely) that Toronto was no longer my home, but rather Jerusalem is.

That became clearer later in my visit. Toward its end, Israel undertook Operation Pillar of Defence in response to incessant rocket attacks into the southern part of the country from Gaza. Hamas' response was to send hundreds of missiles towards civilian targets within a growing range of fire, with long-range projectiles aimed at Tel Aviv.

On the first day of hostilities, I told people that Jerusalem is the safest place to be in Israel in these situations, as Hamas would never target our capital and risk hitting Muslim holy sites. The next day, I was on my way to meet a friend who was to show me around the new Jewish community centre in Vaughan. On the way, I was listening to CBC Radio when news of air raid sirens in Jerusalem and an explosion were announced. I froze, parked the car and phoned home to make certain my wife and kids were OK.

There's a link between both parts of my story. Israel is the place I now happily and proudly call home, where my family and I enjoy a good life. Sometimes it requires doing battle with true enemies, such as Hamas. And it's still a work in progress, where some of us are struggling to make it a more pluralistic place, one we can feel even more at home in. In that vein, we Israelis can still learn much from you, our brothers in the Diaspora.

Israel's democratic dilemmas on full display

As Israel moves closer to general elections scheduled for Jan. 22, the achievements of Israeli democracy, as well as its structural limitations, are on clear display.

There are 34 parties registered to compete for the 120 seats in the Knesset, covering the full range of public opinion – left, right, centre, religious, anti-religious, green, olim (immigrants mainly from the former Soviet Union), pensioners, militant Arabs that deny the legitimacy of Israel, etc. As many as 12 parties are expected to win seats, ensuring that a wide range of views will again be represented.

In this sense, Israeli democracy is thriving, under extremely difficult conditions and contrary to the public relations campaigns of Diaspora organizations that warn of imminent doom in order raise money and gain influence. Women head two of the major party lists – the newly revived Labor, which is expected to lead the opposition, and Tzipi Livni, who has formed yet another party.

At the same time, many young people and others outside the traditional political blocs and interest groups, are alienated from the mid-19th century eastern European system of deals and "machers."

Israelis vote for a single national party list, rather than for individual representatives.

There are no constituencies or ridings, and no Knesset member is accountable for a particular district or region. For the upcoming elections, Netanyahu's Likud list merged with Lieberman's Yisrael Beitenu, which gives supporters of one group no choice but to support the other or find an alternative. Some alienated voters are expected to go with the party formed by this round's "new face" – Yair Lapid, a post-ideological media celebrity seen as outside the old system.

Based on past experience, a limited protest vote will not, by itself, force a change in the system or increase the level of democratic responsibility, which is one of the reasons for repeated corruption cases brought against top politicians (although this is by no means unique to Israel). With so many interests benefiting from an antiquated system, a long-overdue change will require a major change involving the large established parties.

The plethora of micro-parties, some with only two, three or four seats out of the 120 total, also leads to weak coalition governments that are unable to tackle core domestic and social challenges in a sustainable manner. In the 2008 elections, the two largest parties – Likud and Kadima – each received less than a quarter of the total seats. To form a government, (after Livni refused to join a broad coalition under Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu), they had to negotiate and horse trade with numerous smaller parties – a process that gave Netanyahu a small but decisive edge, particularly in wooing the religious parties.

The price for their support, however, was more gridlock, particularly in dealing with unresolved conflicts in the revival of Jewish national self-determination (in other words, Zionism). The two critical issues that brought the present government to an end and forced elections a year earlier than necessary focus on military exemptions for the growing haredi sector and the difficulty in prioritizing budget cuts while reducing the gap between rich and poor.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Public opinion polls show that the majority of Israelis want to see an end to the special treatment and mass army exemptions given automatically every year to thousands of young haredi men. After different experiments failed, the Israeli High Court of Justice ruled that these exemptions are discriminatory and must not continue. But no prime minister or government, including Netanyahu's, has been willing to risk the political cost of alienating haredi coalition partners. In addition, as Israel follows other countries in the need for economic belt-tightening, the subsidies provided to the haredi sector must clearly be cut. But this, too, would bring down a narrow coalition government.

Perhaps the results this time will finally allow for a broad coalition, in which small haredi parties would lose their veto power, and these core issues can be tackled. But there is also a realization that other democracies around the world are plagued by their own difficulties, and no system is perfect. Despite the imperfections, Israel's democratic society remains a very impressive accomplishment.

Avigdor Lieberman was a politician, not a statesman

Avigdor Lieberman began and ended his tenure as Israel's foreign minister on an inauspicious note.

Within a day of assuming office on April 1, 2009, he was summoned by police and questioned on suspicion of corruption. A little more than a year later, the police issued a recommendation for his indictment on breach of trust.

In normal democracies, a government minister whose honesty and integrity have been compromised leaves immediately and awaits his fate. In Israel, however, conventional norms applicable to civilized nations are not necessarily observed. Consequently, Lieberman faced no real pressure to resign.

His boss, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, could have removed him from cabinet pending his exoneration. He refrained from doing so because he felt he could not survive politically without the support of Lieberman's ultra-nationalist party, Yisrael Beitenu, which held the balance of power after winning 15 Knesset seats in the last election.

Lieberman could have followed in the footsteps of Ehud Olmert, who stepped down as prime minister in 2008 before formal charges of corruption were laid against him. Instead, Lieberman waited until the last possible moment to act – 24 hours after Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein's disclosure that he would be indicted on charges of breach of trust and fraud.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

After finally announcing his resignation, Lieberman proclaimed his innocence, expressing hope he could clear his name prior to the general election on Jan. 22. In the meantime, he remains chair of Yisrael Beitenu, which is largely supported by Russian immigrants like himself.

Lieberman, one of Israel's most polarizing figures, may well bounce back. Polls indicate that the joint right-wing list composed of Yisrael Beitenu and Likud will likely regain power. If this scenario unfolds, and if Lieberman manages to clear his name, he will be invited to rejoin Netanyahu's government. Netanyahu, whose working relationship with Lieberman dates back to the 1980s, may even give Lieberman back his old job.

To liberals and middle-of-the roaders in Israel and abroad, Lieberman's return to the foreign ministry would be an extremely unfortunate development.

Lieberman, a stridently outspoken hardliner, a bull in a china shop, was one of the most belligerent and divisive people to hold this sensitive portfolio.

Some people admire straight-talkers like Lieberman, but in the world of diplomacy, where one ill-chosen word or phrase can trigger an international incident, alienate a partner or tarnish the image of a nation, circumspection is a more valued trait.

Lieberman was not the first Israeli foreign minister to behave like a politician rather than a statesman. One of his predecessors, the future prime minister Ariel Sharon, once urged Jewish settlers to "run and grab as many (Palestinian) hilltops as they can" so that Israel could retain possession of as much of the West Bank as possible.

In the Sharon tradition, Lieberman was nothing if not combative, a secular right-wing nationalist who hewed closely to his principles in performing his duties.

An acolyte of the Revisionist brand of Zionism, he was the director general of the Likud party from 1993 to 1996 and the director general of the prime minister's office from 1996 to 1997.

When Netanyahu ceded the bulk of Hebron to the Palestinian Authority under the 1997 Wye River agreement, he resigned from the Likud party.

An advocate of conflict management rather than conflict resolution, he entered the Knesset in 1999 and joined Sharon's government in 2001, only to resign in protest over his plan to unilaterally withdraw from the Gaza Strip and four settlements in the West Bank.

In 2008, he left Olmert's government, citing his opposition to resuming peace talks with the Palestinians. "Negotiations on the basis of land for peace are a critical mistake," he claimed.

Thanks to Lieberman's party's third-place finish in the 2009 election, Netanyahu appointed him foreign minister, succeeding Tzipi Livni. On the day Lieberman replaced her, he declared that the Annapolis Middle East peace conference, convened by the United States in 2007 to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict through a two-state solution, lacked "validity."

A resident of a West Bank settlement, Lieberman eventually came out in support of "a viable Palestinian state." But at best, he paid lip service to the concept, mocking the "peace industry" as a waste of time and money and asserting it would yield no result.

Together with Netanyahu, Lieberman, a self-styled realist, worked to achieve an interim accord with the Palestinians, claiming that a final-status agreement was unattainable.

Lieberman regarded Mahmoud Abbas – the president of the Palestinian Authority and one of the most moderate figures in the Palestinian camp – as "a man of terrorism" and "an obstacle to peace." He called for his replacement by "a new, legitimate... leadership." Netanyahu distanced himself from Lieberman's attack, while Defence Minister Ehud Barak said his comments "do not represent Israeli policy, and harm Israeli interests."

Avigdor Lieberman

In yet another attempt to blacken Abbas' reputation, Lieberman proposed that key Israeli embassies in Europe should run full-page ads in major newspapers denigrating Abbas. According to reports, senior foreign ministry officials in Jerusalem dismissed it as "an idea divorced from realty." For his part, Abbas accused Lieberman of "killing the peace process."

When the Palestinian Authority announced its intention to upgrade its status at the United Nations, Israel's foreign ministry threatened to cancel the Oslo accords. The Palestinians prevailed at the UN, and Oslo remained standing.

Lieberman was a vociferous defender of Israeli settlements in the West Bank. In one encounter, he clashed with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who, like President Barack Obama, described them as illegal under international law and an obstacle to peace-making.

In the wake of the Arab Spring, Lieberman strived to improve bilateral relations with Egypt, one of two Arab countries that have signed a peace treaty with Israel. But Lieberman was persona non grata in Cairo, having made incendiary remarks about Egypt before becoming foreign minister.

Lieberman was also a stumbling block in efforts to repair Israel's now frayed relationship with Turkey. Of late, he recognized the importance of normalizing relations with Ankara. But for the record, Lieberman allowed Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon, a Yisrael Beitenu party member, to publicly insult Turkey's ambassador in a notorious incident in Jerusalem. And Lieberman put up sharp resistance to issuing a formal apology to Turkey for the 2010 Mavi Marmara incident, which gravely damaged Israel's ties with its former ally.

Lieberman's views on Israeli Arabs were also problematic. In a speech to the United Nations, he spoke of "moving borders to better reflect demographic realities," thus reviving a scheme to place some Arab citizens outside Israeli territory. Netanyahu's office disowned his speech, saying its contents had not been vetted.

In retrospect, Lieberman was something of a wild card, but ultimately, he and Netanyahu were close allies, and Lieberman was his master's voice in a recognizable good-cop-bad-cop routine.

Iron Dome is part of a multi-layered defence system

"It was nice to see Israelis working like one nation. It was really, really nice."

Despite the massive technical problems associated with shooting down speeding rockets and shells, the project was taken from drawing board to deployment in only three years. During the recent Operation Pillar of Defence, Iron Dome batteries opened 573 times, knocking down 421 out of 1,506 missiles that were fired from Gaza. Iron Dome's sophisticated battle-management system calculated which rockets were heading for uninhabited areas and only fired on those aimed at populated areas. CNN reported the system had an 85 per cent success rate.

The technical problems making the system work were considerable, D said. "It's a system made up of other systems." There's radar and fire control – the Israelis call it "battle management." All the systems have to communicate very quickly. "My specialty is systems engineering, taking parts and having them talk to each other."

Iron Dome is a vast improvement over the Patriot missile system, which was deployed during the Gulf War in 1990-91 and shot down incoming Scud missiles. However, the Patriots hit the Scud motors, and the falling wreckage was dangerous in its own right. Iron Dome explodes close to the incoming projectile outside populated areas, he said.

During Operation Pillar of Defence, his team was constantly provided data about the system's performance and made changes to the software to "make it work better." It is designed to "stay eight or nine steps ahead of the enemy" and worked as intended when Palestinians attempted to overwhelm it with massive rocket barrages.

Despite its successes, Iron Dome was not always a popular option, D stated. "When [it] was being developed, a lot of people were against the idea of an Iron Dome."

Some were concerned it cost too much, others that there wasn't enough oversight, and still others believed there were better alternatives.

Engineers considered different approaches, but lasers were rejected since they don't work when it's rainy. Projectile defences that fire thousands of rounds and create a steel curtain were also rejected, since those bullets are still live when they hit the ground.

With Iron Dome, there is still debris, but it is designed to fall in unpopulated areas, D said.

Remarkably, the Israeli military establishment was skeptical "at the outset." Defence planners saw the system as a reversal of traditional Israeli military doctrine – of taking the initiative. They worried Israel would become too passive and reactive, D said.

"I don't know" if the unintended result of Iron Dome is "to hide in the shadows," but consider Operation Pillar of Defence, he continued. Tens of thousands of soldiers were mobilized and made ready for a ground offensive. "If Iron Dome did not work so well, we probably would have gone into Gaza."

Iron Dome should be part of a balanced solution of offence and defence, D added.

Iron Dome has received more than $200 million in funding from the U.S. government, though it was developed by Israel. "This is huge" for bilateral relations, D said. "It is an opportunity for the United States to be part of the destiny. This is sharing in the destiny."

As for the system's practical benefits, it's already had an impact on Israelis. "People write to us and say they feel safe," D said.

That, too, can have unintended consequences. Three people were killed in Kiryat Malachi as they stood on their balcony watching Iron Dome batteries intercept incoming rockets. But no system is foolproof and on that occasion, Iron Dome missed. Bolts and other shards attached to the incoming missile killed the three onlookers.

It might also be a bit premature to alter Halachah because of Iron Dome's successes, D continued. Rabbinic authorities have reversed an earlier ruling that had permitted people at prayer to seeking shelter when warning sirens are heard. The chief rabbi has now stated that they can keep praying, as there is no longer a danger.

"As an aside, that's a mistake," D said. "Iron Dome lessens the chance of being hit, but not to zero."

Project will train new generation of chess instructors, coaches

According to Bushinsky, the project is potentially very important for training a new generation of chess instructors and coaches.

Many Israeli chess trainers who acquired their expertise in the former Soviet Union have moved abroad or are no longer employed in the field.

Nonetheless, chess is very popular among Israelis of Russian descent, and Israel has more than 30 grandmasters, a significant achievement for a country of its size and population. As a result, Israel is a superpower in chess, having won numerous medals in international competitions.

But there are troubling signs that Israel's standing in chess may be on the wane, Bushinsky warned.

Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union played an integral role in catapulting Israel to chess prominence. But Israeli grandmasters are getting old and very few new ones are joining the club, he pointed out.

As well, chess is underappreciated by Israeli society and its leadership, he claimed.

Which is why this project may yet make a real difference to chess in Israel.

Righteous Gentiles' grandchildren accept awards

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Two grandchildren of Yad Vashem's Righteous Among the Nations – Matylda Liro, a Polish journalist in the United States, and Michael Bulik, who operates a Mississauga bakery – were honoured recently at Congregation Habonim in Toronto.

They were presented with awards by the March of the Living for their grandparents' heroism during the Holocaust.

Anita Ekstein and Sally Wasserman, who were both saved by Polish Righteous Gentiles during the Holocaust era, presented the awards.

Eli Rubenstein, national director of March of the Living of Canada, said "although the Holocaust is a story of how humanity can descend to the ultimate depths of almost unimaginable cruelty, yet there is another story which also must be told.

"It is a story that involves, bravery and altruism beyond belief where people took enormous risks to save others. The study of the Holocaust does not cause us to give up completely on humanity.

"It is courageous people like your grandparents," he told Liro and Bulik, "who serve as role models in our own lives."

In 1995, the film Wanda's Lists: Children Without a Name was shown on Polish and Israeli television. In it, Israelis who had survived the Holocaust told the childhood stories of their rescues during the war in the hopes that someone could reveal to them their identities.

Matti Greenberg's story was one that was told. Liro, then 15 years old, remembers watching the film with her grandmother, Antonina. Her grandmother became very emotional and revealed that she put three-year-old Tolek Weinstein – who was later named Matti Greenberg – on a train when she could no longer protect him from the Nazis.

She had been a good friend of Tolek's parents, who were caught up in the Warsaw Ghetto. She promised the Weinsteins that she would try to save their son.

A Polish nurse, Jozefa Bulik, rescued young Tolek. She took him home to her parents, Antonina and Ignacy, and they hid him in their home and bakery.

The Buliks took a great risk even though they saw their neighbours and their families executed for hiding Jews.

After the war, Weinstein, by then known as Greenberg, was taken to Israel, where he became a well-known and respected officer in the Israel Defence Forces.

Antonina Liro contacted Greenberg after she saw Wanda's Lists. Now in his 50s and living in Israel, Greenberg, who was unaware of his real name, learned he was really Tolek Weinstein.

Matylda Liro and Michael Bulik met for the first time at the March of the Living event, where Wanda's Lists was screened.

"I am here for my grandmother, to remember her," Liro said. "My grandmother was just being human in this situation. She was a very good, generous person.

"It's amazing that I can finally meet Michael. This story changed my life, and thanks to that I am a great friend of Israel."

Bulik recalled that his father talked about the German army coming to his next-door neighbour and in front of his eyes shooting the whole family because they were hiding Jews.

"My parents were good decent people. It must have been in their hearts to risk their lives to save this boy. Perhaps they saw their own children in this little boy," Bulik said.

"On a human level, they knew this little boy would be dead if they did not take him in."

He described his family as quiet and private. "Matti's story is a sequence of events which are so extraordinary, you can't even imagine how they happened," said Bulik, whose family moved to Toronto after the war and now run a CORhechshered bakery in Mississauga.

"All of us think we would do the same, but in reality, when it comes to it, you cannot answer that question until you are in the same position."

Rubenstein told The CJN that "when the people who attended the award event first met Liro and Bulik, you could sense how uplifted they immediately felt.

"To be in the presence of these noble people whose families had acted in such heroic ways and to witness their admiration of their grandparents, and at the same time their absolute and utter humility, was to be in the presence of pure goodness. It was awe inspiring," Rubenstein said.

"Courageous people can serve as role models in our own lives so that young people are given hope for the future and an understanding that evil was resisted during the darkest of times and can still be confronted today."

Gun culture in Israel, U.S. not comparable

Wayne LaPierre, the head of the U.S.-based National Rifle Association, is without doubt an expert on America's gun-crazed culture, to which he makes his own singular contribution. He's no expert at all, however, on Israeli society, despite his effort to invoke Israel in order to help justify his interpretation of the American "right to bear arms" in the aftermath of the horrific massacre of 20 children and six adults at a Newtown, Conn., public school on Dec. 14.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On NBC's Dec. 24 Meet the Press show, LaPierre rejected calls for tighter gun controls and instead backed up his proposal to have armed guards at all U.S. schools by, among other things, claiming that Israel provides a model for how this is effectively achieved. "Israel had a whole lot of school shootings until they did one thing: they said, 'We're going to stop it,' and they put armed security in every school and they have not had a problem since then,'" he said.

LaPierre's ignorance is riveting. He's utterly mistaken about Israel, the way that country deals with its security issues and its attitude towards guns.

Reporting from Jerusalem for the New York Daily News, Matthew Kalman wrote: "When it comes to Israel and school shootings, Wayne LaPierre doesn't know what he's talking about, Israeli security experts said."

According to these experts, such shootings are very rare in Israel – two in the past four decades – and have resulted from terror attacks, not "crazed gunmen." But it's the army and security services that Israel relies upon to deal with terror attacks, not armed citizens or even armed guards.

Kalman drew attention to Yigal Palmor, spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, who remarked that the situation in Israel was "fundamentally different" from what Americans face. "We didn't have a series of school shootings, and they had nothing to do with the issue at hand in the United States. We had to deal with terrorism," Palmor said. "What removed the danger was not the armed guards but an overall anti-terror policy and anti-terror operations which brought street terrorism down to nearly zero over a number of years."

Palmor added: "It would be better not to drag Israel into what is an internal American discussion."

LaPierre might also be surprised to learn that, as Kalman observed, "In recent years, restrictions on gun ownership in Israel have been tightened, not relaxed... Despite having a standing army of more than 100,000 and police and security guards carrying guns on the street, Israel has strict firearms licensing and supervision."

The Jerusalem office of the Associated Press put this issue in perspective in a story carried by The Times of Israel (Dec. 24): "Though military service in Israel is compulsory, routine familiarity with weapons does not carry over into civilian life. Israel has far fewer private weapons per capita than the U.S., and while there have been gangster shootouts on the streets from time to time, gun rampages outside the context of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict are unheard of."

On a completely different subject – some small but positive moves in Turkey-Israel relations have recently caught the eye of Reuters:

• In November, Israel and Turkey entered talks to end their diplomatic crisis stemming from the May 2010 Mavi Mamara incident. This is occurring despite the fact that Turkey is still demanding a formal apology from Israel for the deaths of nine Turks killed by Israeli commandos trying to prevent the ship from running Israel's naval blockade of the Gaza Strip.

• Around the same time, Turkey agreed to purchase airborne warning and control systems for its spy-planes from a subsidiary of Israel Aircraft Industries.

• Late last month, Turkey dropped its previous objections to Israel's participation in non-military NATO activities in 2013. According to Israeli analysts, Turkey fears growing instability from Iran and Syria – especially the possibility that Syria could use its chemical weapons – and to this degree, shares regional security concerns with Israel.

Guest Voice

Anyone who paid attention to the social justice protests of 2011 in Israel knows that the country we once envisioned as egalitarian and just has trouble living up to its original ideals.

But if you are as committed to Israel as we at the New Israel Fund of Canada are, that simply gets you to the next step – doing something about it.

Fortunately, much is being done about Israel's social justice issues, and the civil society we support is leading the way.

For example, to help cultivate new leaders in the next generation, BINA, a secular yeshiva in Israel, fosters national leadership among young Israelis through the application of Jewish texts to real-world social issues.

Students participate in year-long programs during and between their military service injecting national responsibility for social issues into Israeli discourse using a pluralistic, tolerant approach based on the best Jewish values. The New Israel Fund of Canada supports this initiative by BINA.

To strengthen Israel's civil society, SHATIL, the New Israel Fund's action arm, trains nascent non-profit organizations in the business of running themselves. Across the country, SHATIL strengthens organizations from their inception at the grassroots level to govern themselves, fundraise, keep to a budget and grow. The New Israel Fund of Canada supports SHATIL.

Working with communities to break the cycle of poverty, Mahapach-Taghir offers financial aid to university students from Israel's most marginalized communities. In return, those students tutor neighbourhood kids and conduct workshops on women's rights and healthy living for adults, thereby introducing the benefits of higher education and public health back into their villages. The New Israel Fund of Canada supports this initiative as well.

It's been widely reported by scholars and sociologists, pulpit rabbis and our own children that the tie to Israel may be more tenuous for the next generations of North American Jews.

That's why North American Jews are poorly served by the vision of a romanticized Israel and by an absence of discussion of real Israeli life and challenges. For secular Jews, Israel is not primarily the nation given to us at Mount Sinai, but the living embodiment of an ancient people challenged to create a modern, tolerant and just society.

Young North American Jews want their own authentic connection to Israel, separate from their parents and grandparents. They want to grapple with a "real Israel" whose imperfections give way to a personal invitation for tikkun olam.

That's why the New Israel Fund of Canada works hard to ensure that the next generations of Canadian Jews will take up Israel's cause and leave their own mark on an Israel that needs them.

We don't agree that younger generations will reject Israel if it's portrayed critically within the context of an abiding commitment to its strength and survival. Instead, they will do the opposite – they will find a personal connection and a reason to commit to an Israel not of the past, but of the future.

Orit Sarfaty is executive director of the New Israel Fund of Canada.

Winnipeg enjoys more kosher meat options

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — There may not be local ritual slaughter going on, but observant Jews in Manitoba's capital now have more choices for kosher meat than they've enjoyed in a long time.

Within the last couple of years, the Superstore, Sobeys and Price Choppers supermarkets serving Winnipeg's south end and a Superstore in the north end have all introduced frozen kosher meat and chicken products, mainly from Toronto.

The plentiful new supply relieves a situation that had existed since fresh kosher slaughter came to an end here in the summer of 2006 and the city's last kosher butcher shop closed its doors a couple of years later.

"It's great to have some more options now," said Faye Rosenberg-Cohen, planning director at the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, who keeps kosher herself.

"It's almost ironic that our options in terms of kosher meat have actually increased since Bathurst and Omnitsky closed," said kosher meat consumer Morris Bloom. "It's nice to see that others picked up the slack."

The Bathurst Street Market, which closed in 2006, was a north end kosher grocery store and restaurant operated by a shomer Shabbat family. It sold deli products as well as kosher meat imported from Toronto and Montreal. Omnitsky, Winnipeg's last kosher butcher, lost its hechsher in 2006 and finally closed in 2008.

"In recognition of the growing cultural diversity in many Canadian neighbourhoods, Loblaw is proud to offer our customers a wide range of ethnic products, such as kosher meat," Loblaw, which operates the Superstores, said about its decision to introduce kosher meat in some of its Winnipeg locations.

"Although we cannot discuss specifics in terms of sales and strategy, the introduction of kosher meat in Winnipeg stores came as we realize that this is a growing market and that a number of stores are beginning to receive inquiries from clients interested in the supply of kosher products."

Winnipeg and Manitoba used to have a thriving fresh kosher meat industry. There were many recognized shoichets and butcher shops. Rabbi Peretz Weizman (formerly of Winnipeg and now living in Toronto) used to boast that his hechsher was universally recognized and that the beef under his supervision was sold as far away as Israel.

But as has happened in other North American communities, over time, the city's Jewish population declined, and the number of Jews keeping kosher declined even more.

First, the chicken went. After the last chicken processor closed, however, frozen chicken (whole, breast, thighs and legs) was still widely available in outlets in areas with substantial Jewish populations, and ritual cattle slaughter continued on a once- or twice-a-week basis.

But in the summer of 2006, Omnitsky, the city's last kosher butcher shop, lost its hechsher, and the local kashrut agency retired Winnipeg's last two shoichets. Within the year, Bathurst Street market also closed due to a lack of business.

Ed and Barbara Reiss operate Desserts Plus, which supplies kosher deli products as well as kosher meat from outside Winnipeg. (Myron Love photo)

What's changed since then? No one seems to have a clear answer.

Winnipeg's Jewish population has grown over the past few years with an influx of Israeli and Russian Israeli immigrants. (After reaching a high of 21,000 in 1961, Winnipeg's Jewish population dropped to 14,000 by 2002 and now stands at about 16,500 due to an immigrant recruitment drive.)

But the newcomers generally don't keep kosher.

Perhaps it's a matter of geography. Omnitsky and Bathurst Street Market were both located in the north end, while a majority of Jews had moved to south Winnipeg and elsewhere.

The Jewish community wasn't entirely bereft after Omnitsky and Bathurst closed, however. Although not initially under kosher supervision, Desserts Plus in south Winnipeg had been selling frozen kosher beef and chicken for several years before Omnitsky's demise. (Desserts Plus has since come under kosher supervision.)

And shortly after Omnitsky went out of business, Gunn's Bakery in north Winnipeg (one of two long-established kosher bakeries in the city) began stocking frozen beef and chicken for its customers.

"We felt that there was a need in the north end and decided to provide that service [selling kosher meat] to our customers," said co-owner Fivie Gunn.

Frozen chicken and a small selection of kosher beef products also became available at a north end IGA supermarket.

While Rabbi Ari Ellis of Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue is happy to see the additional options, he hopes the added competition doesn't hurt business at Gunn's and Desserts Plus.

Initially the supermarkets were selling kosher meat for significantly less than Desserts Plus and Gunn's.

"We're not making tons of money on the meat," Gunn said. "Yet the supermarkets were selling their products for less than we pay to bring it in."

In recent weeks, that has changed. "The competition has pulled in its horns a bit," said Desserts Plus' Ed Reiss. "They were selling at a loss. Now, their prices are similar to ours."

Gunn said that despite the supermarkets' lower pricing, his customers remained loyal.

And Desserts Plus also sell deli products and other meats – such as kosher lamb – that no one else carries.

Iranian group added to terror list

The Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) Qods Force is now a listed terrorist entity under Canada's Anti-Terrorism Act.

According to the Ministry of Public Safety, the Qods Force is the clandestine branch of the IRGC responsible for extraterritorial operations and for exporting the Iranian Revolution through activities such as facilitating terrorist operations.

"The Qods Force provides arms, funding and paramilitary training to extremist groups, including the Taliban, Lebanese Hezbollah, Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command," the ministry said in a statement.

The news came Dec. 20 from Public Safety Minister Vic Toews, following the government's Dec. 11 addition of the IRGC to the list of entities under the Special Economic Measures Act (SEMA), which allows Canada to take action against businesses, groups and individuals who fund such organizations.

Jewish community organizations greeted the news enthusiastically. The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) called it a "clear message to Tehran" that Canada will hold it to account for "past and future acts of terrorism."

CIJA chair David Koschitzky said his organization had called on the government to list the IRGC "for many years."

It's "the next logical step in countering international terrorism," he said.

"חינכנו אותם שזה הבית שלנו ואסור לוותר על המדינה. בתור ההורים זה מאד קשה. גם נשארים לבד וגם יש בזה התרסקות ערכית. לא חינכנו את הילדים לעזוב....ועצוב לנו שהם לא רואים עתיד במדינה הזו".

Hamas-Fatah truce signals trouble for Israel

In his recent triumphal return to Gaza, Hamas leader, Khaled Meshal, immediately ramped up the rhetoric against Israel, proclaiming that "Palestine is ours, from the river to the sea and from the south to the north." He vowed that "there will be no concession on an inch of the land" and that "we will never recognize the legitimacy of the Israeli occupation, and therefore there is no legitimacy for Israel, no matter how long it will take."

He further promised to free thousands of Palestinian prisoners currently in Israeli jails, suggesting that further kidnapping of Israeli soldiers, as needed bargaining chips, is still integral to Hamas' objectives.

When addressing a crowd that was estimated to be in the hundreds of thousands, he used as his backdrop an oversized model of a Hamas missile, shaped as a map of "historic Palestine," without any delineation of Israel.

Meshal's bluster has been carefully rationalized in the wake of Hamas' drubbing by the Israeli Air Force during Operation Pillar of Defence. But perhaps what's been given the greater benefit of the doubt is the position taken by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas when he addressed the UN General Assembly prior to the vote that granted the Palestinians non-member observer status at the United Nations.

In that speech, Abbas set about branding the Israeli government as the agent of "barbaric and horrific" acts (in Gaza), and accusing it of the "perpetration of war crimes." He referred to Israel's "racist, colonial occupation" and described its actions in the 1948 war as "one of the most dreadful campaigns of ethnic cleansing and dispossession in modern history."

Meanwhile Fatah, Abbas' party, has developed a new logo to celebrate its 48th anniversary. According to Palestinian Media Watch, the emblem has as its backdrop a keffiyah enveloping all of what's otherwise recognized as the State of Israel and shows the image of a white dove in shackles and a door key that's intended to represent the "right of return" for Palestinian refugees.

My View

Lawrence Hart

It's in this context that that the latest rapprochement between the PA and Hamas raises very serious concerns. For example, as a first act in their newfound common cause, Fatah permitted Hamas to organize rallies in several West Bank towns. Amid cries to "create a volcano among the Israelis," a Fatah official applauded Hamas for having "given thousands of martyrs, prisoners and wounded for Palestine."

Even more troubling than the bellicose utterances is the report by Israeli military sources that the PA security forces are openly collaborating with Hamas operatives to foment unrest and physical violence in the West Bank. This has included the obstruction of road traffic, the shutting down of towns and even direct attacks on Israeli army patrols, as occurred in Hebron on Dec. 6.

The pervasive climate of hostility and suspicion that characterizes the Palestinian-Israeli relationship has undoubtedly been complicated by the misguided actions of Abbas at the UN and Meshal's return to Gaza, with each trying to outdo the other in vilifying Israel. The prospect of Hamas and the PA as bedfellows adds yet another dimension – as yet not fully tested, but likely ominous – to an already volatile situation. This should not be underestimated.

Gefilte fish: why all the carping?

It may not have the recuperative qualities of hot chicken soup. Or the sweet aroma of freshly baked challah. But love it, or not, gefilte fish has made quite a mark on Jewish culinary life.

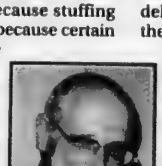
Why gefilte fish? And why the Jews? Claudia Rosen examines the talmudic sources that brought this fish to the Sabbath table. "Gefilte fish evolved as a Sabbath dish because stuffing gives it glamour and because certain versions eliminate the need to remove bones (which could be considered a forbidden activity on the Sabbath)." [http://bit.ly/gefilte1]

Not so quick says Rabbi Haym Soloveitchik. He adds reassuringly that it seems those who have opted not to eat gefilte fish have not suffered from communal opprobrium. "Gefilte fish is an east European dish, and Jews had been eating fish on Sabbath for some 15 centuries before this culinary creation. Even in eastern Europe, I know of no instance of someone being labelled a mehallel (desecrator of) Shabbas and run out of town for eating 'non-gefilte' fish." [http://bit.ly/gefilte2]

But could our attachment to gefilte fish run even deeper? Could it be mystical? Food writer Gil Marks explains, "For millennia, no Sabbath meal has been considered complete without fish, Friday night encompassing the theme of creation and Shalosh Seudot at the end of Shabbat that [will be during the days of] the messiah. The Talmud (Shabbat 118b) stated, 'Wherewith does one show delight in the Sabbath?' Rav Judah, the son of Samuel ben Shilath, said in the name of Rav, 'With beets (the greens), a large fish and garlic.' Even a trifle, if it is prepared in honour of Shabbat is a delight. What is it (a trifle)? Rav Papa said, 'Fish hash.'" Then Gil Marks adds, "Perhaps the latter dish consisting of chopped fish was the inspiration for the Ashkenazi gefilte fish." [http://bit.ly/gefilte3]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz



So what went wrong? Tamara Mann points to the growth of kosher food in America and the commercialization of Jewish foods. "Authenticity and nostalgia, postwar businesses gleefully discovered, could be bottled, packaged and sold. And while numerous foods, such as cholent, kishka and chopped liver recalled the steamy kitchens of the Lower East Side and Brooklyn, only one food could be easily mass produced and slapped on the table without reheating: gefilte fish." [http://bit.ly/gefilte7]

Or as Miriam Silver mouth-wateringly describes it, "Fast forward to contemporary U.S.A. with its fast-food convenience culture, and those oval, grey fish balls, mass-manufactured, tanked in a jar, swimming in jelly, along with a few old cooked carrots." [http://bit.ly/gefilte5]

We have indeed noticed those glass jars with four or so pieces of gefilte fish suspended in a bath of gelatinous goo. But did you ever suspect that someone took out a patent on these vertical boneless fish – just as they do for iPads or jet turbines? You can read up on the "method of preparing an edible fish product" patented Oct. 29, 1963, at the United States Patent and Trademark Office. More than 3,000 words and a page of illustrations, all to secure Patent No. 3,108,882!

And here's to you, "inventors" of mass-market gefilte fish – and a slice of our heritage: Monroe Nash and Erich G. Freudenstein. [http://bit.ly/gefilte6]

Next time, gefilte fish: the great debates.

Why buy flowers?

Rabbi Yisroel Bernath

Whenever I think of a wedding of someone close, I think of the simple advice that my rabbi gave me before I got married.

He called me into his study, because he was going to share the secrets of a long-lasting relationship. I was excited, because I knew nothing about marriage, and quite honestly, I was pretty scared.

The rabbi leaned across the table and looked into my eyes, "Yisroel," he smiled as his eyes widened, "it is a mitzvah to give your wife flowers before Shabbat, and that is the Jewish secret to a long-lasting, loving marriage."

That's it? That's the secret? Really? But why?

I never really understood the whole women and flowers thing. Let's be real here: the flowers are cut and are in the process of dying, and in a few days, she will throw them out.

At least a potted plant is alive and will last a little while if it's taken care of.

Rabbinic Reflections

So why flowers? Flowers are useless. They're impractical and temporary, and they're not an investment.

But that's precisely their power. You buy them for no other reason than because your wife likes them. You do it just for her.

This is the very definition of romance – doing something pointless, just to express love. Nobody needs flowers. They won't be around forever, but someone you love likes them, so you buy them.

That's why our relationship with God is so romantic. He needs nothing from us humans, and we won't be around forever.

But He gets immense pleasure out of it when we do a mitzvah, an act that He has commanded. So we do it. Not for what we get out of it, and not for what He gets out of it, but just because He likes it.

The moment we do something that makes no sense to us, but makes our loved one happy, we have truly transcended ourselves and connected with someone else.

Stop thinking about yourself and think about her. That's the power of the flower.

Rabbi Yisroel Bernath is spiritual director of the Monkland Jewish Centre – Chabad NDG and the Jewish chaplain at Concordia University in Montreal.

Finding time for books

How does one find time for books? One finds time for books by taking it.

Even in our computer age, books are still the best way to preserve and transmit ideas. Not to speak of the diverse pleasures that books bring to readers. The printed book is a neat, compact, well-behaved invention. It is there when you want it. You need no apparatus to deal with it. It slips into your pocket, it fits your hand, it yields to your eye. A book asks no questions about your colour or creed or college degree.

Long ago John Milton declared: "A good book is the precious lifeblood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose for a life beyond." He hurled a scornful condemnation against the barbaric practice of consigning books to the hellish flames of the auto-da-fé. "Who kills a man kills a reasonable creature created in God's image, but he who destroys a good book kills reason itself," he thundered prophetically.

Jewish tradition, perhaps more than that of any other group, reflects the noble estimate of the value and significance of books. When an ark containing The Book is placed in a room, humble as it might be, that room becomes a shrine. When revered books become old and worn and their pages become lose and separated, it is considered a sacrilege to discard them to the mercy of callous hands or stunted minds or to the whims of shifting winds. Instead they are collected and deposited in the attic of the synagogue, and when space is no longer available, they are buried in a solemn ceremony.

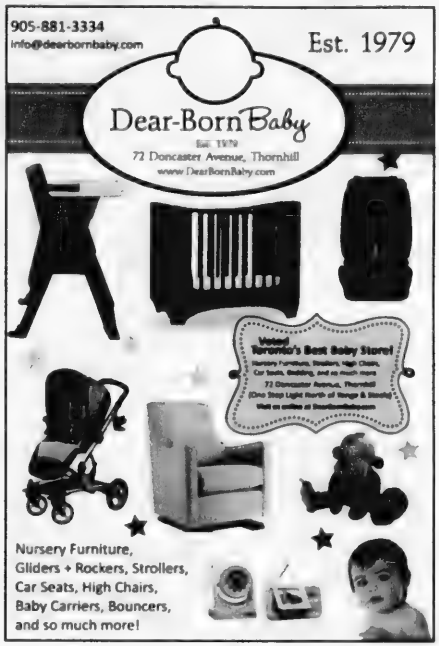
Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

Words of praise for books and reading are widespread and eloquent. In an earlier generation, American author Clarence Day wrote that "the world of books is the most remarkable creation of man. Nothing else that he builds ever lasts. Monuments fall; nations perish; civilizations grow old and die out; and, after an era of darkness, new races build on others. But in the world of books are volumes that have seen this happen again and again, and yet live on, still young and still as fresh as the day they were written, still telling men's hearts of the hearts of me centuries dead."

The Book of Judges speaks of a city in Judah that Joshua called Kiryat Sefer, Book Town. The library in the Hebrew University of Jerusalem today may well be called a modern Kiryat Sefer. In addition to one million volumes and more than 10,000 periodicals, there are many collections catalogued separately. There are also incunabula, microfilms and manuscripts. I know of no other country in the world whose map lists a Kiryat Sefer.

Finally, there is much to consider in the following two selections from the midrash. The first teaches that the sword and the Book came down wrapped together from heaven. The Holy One said: "Keep what is written in the Book or be delivered to the sword." The other midrash maintains that a learned bastard stands higher on the social scale than an ignorant high priest.



Pro-Israel students criticize BDS endorsement

Boycott supported by U of T Graduate Student Union

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Pro-Israel students are criticizing the process that led the University of Toronto Graduate Student Union (GSU) to officially endorse the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel.

The motion was passed at a Dec. 10 council meeting that included an annual general meeting (AGM), in which all graduate students who attended were allowed vote.

The move follows three other university student councils that officially adopted the campaign in the past year – Carleton University, the University of Regina and, most recently, York University.

When the motion was brought up at a council meeting last year with due notice and fair representation of the graduate student population, it failed, said Jason Dumelie, academic and funding commissioner for the GSU.

This time, there was no advance notice of the motion, so nobody except the people pushing for the endorsement knew about it, said Israela Stein, a political science graduate student and Hillel spokesperson. "Obviously, that changed the balance of the vote."

Dumelie said the success of the motion demonstrates the passion and conviction of the people who organized graduate students to come and vote on the motion.

"However, it is not at all clear that it represents the views of a majority of graduate students at the University of Toronto, since no notice of the motion was provided prior to the meeting," he said.

Hart House at University of Toronto

Stein said it's this lack of transparency that leads to arbitrary and illegitimate decisions. And "every student should be bothered by arbitrary decisions."

The AGM is open to all graduate students, where anybody can bring forward any motion, said Erin Oldynski, the GSU's external commissioner. The membership then decides whether to discuss a motion.

According to the union's website, a general meeting "is an opportunity to discuss and guide the work of the students' union, along with approving and scrutinizing audited statements and bylaw amendments."

Therefore, this issue was not suitable for the AGM, Stein said.

At the meeting, Dumelie said he raised a point of order with this concern. Additionally, he said some students questioned the lack of due notification. However, the chair allowed the motion based on the fact it was voted onto the agenda.

Dumelie said it isn't clear people understood the motion had to do with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict when they voted for it and that some thought it had to do with anti-corporatization. Even with a clear description, it was impossible for the vote to be defeated due to the sheer number of people in attendance in support of the motion, as all graduate students who attend have voting rights during an AGM, he said.

Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) is reporting, on rabble.ca, that 97 per cent of students and councillors present at the meeting voted in favour of the motion, and Oldynski said of the roughly 150 people present, no more than 10 voted against it. Typically, 80 to 100 people attend council meetings, she noted.

SAIA representatives did not respond to The CJN by deadline.

Shirin Ezekiel, associate executive director for Hillel of Greater Toronto, said Hillel has been in contact with university administration and is confident the university is taking the matter seriously and will "deal with the GSU in the appropriate manner to ensure procedures are followed."

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is examining the GSU's bylaws and is determining what recommendations it can make to Hillel in "pursuing the apparent violation of bylaws," said Howard English, CIJA's senior vice-president.

Ultimately, the problem with this kind of campaign is that it doesn't challenge Israeli policies, but rather denies Israel's right to self-determination, said Stein. "It's beyond radical."

In response, Oldynski said the motion calls for the university to divest from all companies worldwide that violate human rights – not just Israel. However, the resolution specifically urges the university to "refrain from investing in all companies complicit in the violations of international law," singling out companies that it says "profits from the illegal occupation of Palestinian land, directly benefits from the construction of the wall [security barrier] and Israeli settlements, is economically active in settlements, and profits from the collective punishment of Palestinians."

Now that the motion has passed, the GSU membership will decide the direction it will take, Oldynski said, adding that it may involve lobbying the university administration to divest from companies that violate human rights, organizing discussions on the topic and working with other organizations dedicated to promoting human rights.

The university's statement to The CJN said that although the GSU resolution has endorsed the BDS campaign, "the GSU has no authority to bind its members to any particular course of action at all regarding Israel and Israeli products or academic interchanges or international companies doing business with Israel."

The statement added that the university has a responsible investing committee that advises the university on such matters, and that members of the university community may submit a "convincing and thorough brief" to try to add the issue to the committee's annual agenda.

More than five years ago, university president David Naylor called academic boycotts "antithetical to academic freedom, counter-productive, and likely to do more harm than good as regards any issue of human rights and political or military conflict." In its most recent statement on the endorsement, the university reiterated that it stands by that assertion.

The GSU's endorsement focuses on economic boycotts. However, the larger BDS campaign includes both economic and academic boycotts, Stein said.

Although these endorsements have been called symbolic, since student unions themselves tend not to have actual investments in Israel, Stein said students should still care about what it could lead in the future.

"This is a fight on public opinion and on slander," she said, adding that they are trying to stop it before it leads to action. "Every U of T student should be deeply concerned that this is what is done with their money and, most importantly, in their name."

Bikur Cholim visits the Sephardi elderly

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Hadas Moshonov was looking for a meaningful cause to contribute her time to. But when the 38-year old Israeli-Iraqi met her Sephardi senior, the woman she was assigned to visit through Rav Hesed – Sephardic Bikur Cholim, she realized she would benefit much more than she bargained for.

"She penetrated straight into my heart," said Moshonov, who moved to Toronto from Israel 11 years ago. "Apparently she wasn't receptive to many volunteers before me, but she made a click with me. In the end, she was looking forward to my calls and visits, and it was really special."

Moshonov is one of about 30 people who volunteer with Rav Hesed in Toronto. It was started by Denise Benzaquen Levin, who understood the difficulties involved with caring for seniors when she became responsible for her own parents. When they died within five weeks of each other, she realized the need for a program to help care for Sephardi seniors.

> 'The volunteers are an integral part and so valuable'

"I found a big disconnect in the community of Spanish-speaking people [in Toronto] who would go visit people in hospitals," said Levin. "They wanted to have this comfort of having someone speak to them in their language."

While there are other organizations that cater to Jewish seniors, they don't focus on Sephardi Jews, Levin said. A visit from someone who understands your language, your culture, your food and your traditions makes the connection between volunteer and senior even stronger.

"The clients feel wonderful because they're being connected to people in Spanish, French and Arabic, languages that our volunteers speak," Levin said.

Her own parents, Aaron and Vida Benzaquen, came to Canada from Morocco in 1958 by boat. She said they were among the pioneers of the Sephardi Jewish community in Canada.

"Imagine leaving a beautiful Mediterranean country for cold, cold Canada," she said. "Community was everything to them, their lifeline, and I want to keep that connection."

Since she started the program in 2010, she's recruited volunteers from ages 18 to 70, who visit some 100 Sephardi seniors in Toronto.

The program has been life changing for volunteers like Moshonov. One of the first seniors she visited was the elderly woman who had not been able to connect with other volunteers.

"I could hear in her voice and feel in her smile that even when she was in her last days, she was shining and really, really appreciative, and sometimes it was really hard to go away because we enjoyed each other's company," Moshonov said.

They spoke on the phone regularly and Moshonov would bring flowers almost every week. When she died, Moshonov felt as though she'd lost a friend.

"I really cared for her," she said. "I kind of got attached to her."

It's stories like these that show Levin she's on the right track.

"The best part is knowing that somebody feels a part of their community, that they feel they have a place to turn to. And another best part is to see a smile on their face when you've made a connection. And know that they haven't been forgotten by their community," Levin said.

She credits the success of the program to the tireless work of volunteers who selflessly visit seniors. "The volunteers are an integral part and so valuable. I couldn't do this on my own," she said.

Some volunteers visit seniors, while others invite them into their homes for holiday meals, take them to appointments, send them holiday cards or bring them flowers for Shabbat.

Although the program is currently funded by Levin and private donations, she hopes to expand it in the future. She would like to develop lecture series on care of the elderly, set up a transportation system to help Sephardi seniors get to their appointments, provide Meals on Wheels with a Sephardi twist, and even, one day, open a Sephardi nursing home.

"I would like to be out of business and people wouldn't need it," said Levin, "But as long as it's needed, I want it to be a full place of support when navigating this old-age process and I want to make sure we haven't forgotten any single person in our Sephardi community."

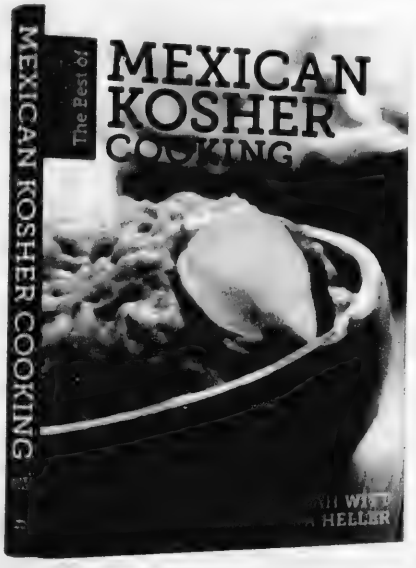
Mexican kosher cooking turns dinner into a fiesta!

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Zipporah Malka Heller and Shifrah Devorah Witt love ethnic food. When the mother/daughter team started keeping kosher about 17 years ago, they stopped eating most of their meals in restaurants and learned how to cook their favourite dishes themselves. Their first cookbook was The Complete Asian Kosher Cookbook. They recently co-authored their second cookbook, The Best of Mexican Kosher Cooking, with over 90 recipes, all accompanied by full-colour photos.

"Every time we eat a Mexican meal, we are magically transported to feeling like we are on vacation, or at a fiesta, a party. Our goal was to create dishes that are both authentic in taste but can be made easily by anyone who wants to step into the kitchen. You don't have to be a master chef to create food that will make your guests think you are one."



Mexican Kosher Cooking offers a wide selection of authentic Mexican recipes, including nachos, several salsa recipes, guacamole, enchiladas, fajitas, burritos, chimichangas, tacos and tostadas. You'll find 7-Layer Bean Dip, Mexican Chicken Wings with Dipping Sauce, Tortilla Soup, Crazy Good Chicken Salad, Refried Beans and Cheese, Chili Rellenos, Grilled Fish Soft Tacos, Fish Veracruz, Arroz con Pollo, Chili con Carne, Mexican Rice, and Refried Beans. Desserts and beverages include Mexican Wedding Cookies, Margarita Ice Cream, Sangria and Mexican Iced Coffee.

The authors provide a list of basic ingredients, herbs and spices to keep in your pantry, refrigerator and freezer to help you prepare a quick Mexican meal when the mood strikes. They explain the difference in fresh chili varieties: Anaheim chilis are mild, Jalapeno are hotter than the bottled, Serrano are a bit hotter than Anaheim, and Habanero are for the fearless!

- Make sure you use disposable plastic gloves to cover your hands while you are working with chili peppers. Wash your hands thoroughly with soap after you are done and refrain from touching your eyes or any other sensitive area.
- Any recipe that is called spicy or has peppers in it can also be delicious without the peppers. Alternatively, feel free to add them to any recipe you wish. Start out mild and work your way up.
- If you get a pepper that is too hot, the way to neutralize the heat is with bread, not water.

The mother/daughter team lived in California for 23 years before moving to Jerusalem in 2004. They now share a multi-generation home close to the shuk (market) Machne Yehuda, with its array of seasonal produce. When they first came to Jerusalem, there were no Mexican restaurants and few Mexican products, but new products continue to arrive, making their cookbook project much easier. Their website is www.mexicankoshercooking.com.

It's easy to turn a simple dinner, Shabbat meal or holiday celebration into a full-fledged fiesta. So bring some sunshine and heat into the cold days of winter ahead with The Best of Mexican Kosher Cooking. Enjoy!

MEXICAN FISH CAKES

These make a wonderful addition to your Chanukah repertoire but are great all year long.

1 (20-oz.) frozen gefilte fish roll, defrosted
4 sundried tomatoes that have been soaked for an hour in warm water, drained, squeezed dry, and minced
1/8 tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 cup fresh cilantro, chopped
4 large cloves garlic, minced
3 eggs, beaten
5 tbsp. flour
3 green onions, chopped
4 tbsp. canola oil for frying

Defrost fish roll and mash into a smooth consistency in a large bowl.

Add all ingredients except oil to the gefilte fish mixture and mix thoroughly. Shape into patties 3 inches wide. (Thin patties will cook faster and go farther, but you can make them any size you like.)

Heat oil in a large frying pan over medium-high heat. Add fish cakes and fry until brown on both sides.

Remove to a platter covered with paper towel to drain excess oil. Great hot or at room temperature. Serves 10-12 as an appetizer.

Accompaniments: Cumin and Garlic Dip or Chipotle Mayonnaise Dip (below)

CUMIN AND GARLIC DIP

1/4 cup olive oil or mayonnaise
1/8-1/4 tsp. cumin
pinch of salt
1 clove fresh garlic, minced (or 1/8 tsp garlic powder)
1/8 tsp. dried red pepper

Mix all ingredients and serve. If using mayonnaise, keep the dip in the refrigerator until you are ready to serve. If using olive oil, serve it at room temperature.

CHIPOTLE MAYONNAISE DIP

Combine 1/2 cup low-fat mayonnaise and 1/2 tsp. chipotle chili pepper. Chill for 15 minutes. (Norene's Note: No chipotle chili pepper? Substitute smoked paprika and a pinch of chili powder.)

New chief rabbi plans to speak for all of UK Jewry

Miriam Shaviv
The Times of Israel

LONDON — Confounding expectations, the incoming British chief rabbi, Ephraim Mirvis, said he hopes to act as a spokesman for the entire Jewish community on the national stage.

"I intend to represent the community as an ambassador to the outside world," he told The Times of Israel, adding that this would be one of his top priorities in office.

The statement will surprise many British Jews, who widely expected that Rabbi Mirvis, who does not currently have a national profile as a speaker, would concentrate primarily on internal issues in the Jewish community.

He also indicated that he hoped to speak for all British Jews, not only for members of the United Synagogue, the group of Orthodox shuls that officially employs the chief rabbi. Neither haredim nor the non-Orthodox denominations defer to the authority of the chief rabbi, and in recent years, the Progressive Movement has been increasingly vocal about its rejection of the chief rabbi as the figurehead for all Anglo-Jews. A statement issued by the Reform movement welcoming Rabbi Mirvis's appointment referred to him as the "Orthodox chief rabbi."

"My formal role extends to a specific number of congregations," said Rabbi Mirvis. "[Outgoing chief rabbi] Lord [Jonathan] Sacks made his mark beyond the confines of the community, and I will likewise be seeking to do that. There is a clear understanding — the chief rabbi has a voice nationally."

In one of his first interviews since he was appointed as the next chief rabbi last month, Rabbi Mirvis outlined his vision of leadership. He said he would "empower" rabbis belonging to the United Synagogue by opening a new department of rabbinic development that would provide "adequate resources to undertake initiatives and engage in creative initiatives for their communities.

"The rabbis will find in me personally someone who cares about their future and welfare," he said.

He also plans to increase educational programs, both formal and informal, identifying education as the key to reversing the decline in membership of the United Synagogue. He turned his own North London community, Finchley United Synagogue, into a "flagship" shul by pioneering a variety of educational initiatives such as the Kinloss Learning Centre, he said.

"'Rabbi' means 'teacher,' and I see the role of chief rabbi as chief teacher," he added.

During the eight-month search process for the chief rabbi, one of the most contentious issues was the candidates' attitudes toward the London Beth Din, or religious court. Although it is officially part of the United Synagogue, its dayanim, or judges, are seen as having blocked much of the progressive agenda with which Rabbi Sacks came into office.

"The chief rabbi is the 'av beth din' [head of the beit din]," said the South African-born Rabbi Mirvis. "The beit din is the court of the chief rabbi. I see myself taking an active role within the beit din."

According to Miri Freud-Kandel, a fellow in modern Judaism at the Oxford Centre for Hebrew and Jewish Studies and an expert on the institution of the chief rabbi, establishing his authority over the beit din is crucial because it will affect Rabbi Mirvis' ability to influence the religious direction of the community. This will be "his most important internal challenge," she said.

Rabbi Mirvis succeeds Rabbi Sacks, an internationally renowned author and public intellectual who speaks frequently on moral, philosophical and theological affairs.

Rabbi Mirvis takes up his new position in September 2013.

He told JTA that he hopes to be an "able and capable representative to the outside world," and would aim to bring an "ethical voice" to debates of national importance.

"A sense of religious identity has never been more relevant, nor more necessary, in our fast-changing world," Rabbi Mirvis said.

Rabbi Ephraim Mirvis

Rabbi Mirvis, 56, currently rabbi of Finchley United Synagogue, one of London's flagship Orthodox congregations, does not intend to neglect internal affairs either. His other top two priorities will be promoting education and empowering local rabbis, in order to bolster the shrinking constituency of Britain's centrist Orthodox synagogues.

Jewish Agency to look into women's prayer at the Kotel

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reportedly asked the Jewish Agency to come up with a solution for non-Orthodox women's groups that want to pray at the Western Wall.

Netanyahu asked the chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, Natan Sharansky, to examine the issue, the Associated Press reported, citing an unnamed Israeli government official.

The AP quoted Jewish Agency spokesman Benjamin Rutland as saying that Netanyahu told Sharansky that the Western Wall "must remain a source of Jewish unity rather than division."

Earlier this month, four women were detained at the Western Wall by Israeli police for trying to enter the site with prayer shawls to pray with the Women of the Wall organization.

Women of the Wall has held a special prayer service at the holy site almost each month for the last 20 years on Rosh Chodesh, or the beginning of a new Hebrew month, at the back of the women's section.

Women participating in the Rosh Chodesh service have been arrested nearly every month since June for wearing prayer shawls or for "disturbing public order."

In 2003, Israel's Supreme Court upheld a government ban on women wearing tfillin or tallit prayer shawls, or reading from a Torah scroll at the Western Wall.

"On behalf of the 1,700 Conservative rabbis who comprise our movement, the Rabbinical Assembly supports Israel in its efforts to work toward ensuring women's equality and religious pluralism – both in the most sacred moment of prayer at the Western Wall – and throughout life in Israel. All Jews should feel welcome and be legally permitted to express their Judaism freely at this holy place we all share," Rabbi Julie Schonfeld, executive vice-president of the Rabbinical Assembly, the international umbrella organization for Conservative rabbis, said in a statement issued Dec. 26.

Marcie Natan, national president of Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, said in a statement: "As a member of the Jewish Agency Board of Governors, Hadassah looks forward to participating in this important effort and hopes that a resolution can be reached which will allow all women to pray, individually and collectively, at the Kotel freely, without harassment, and in accordance with their own religious practices."

U.K. minister attacks Israel's construction plans

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — A British minister last Thursday harshly condemned Israel for its plans to expand construction in east Jerusalem and for conferring university status on a college in the West Bank city of Ariel, using damning language rarely used by government officials.

While international outcries following Israeli announcements of construction beyond the Green Line, Israel pre-1967 borders, are a common occurrence, U.K. Minister for the Middle East Alistair Burt took the unusual step of mentioning the Geneva Conventions, likely implying that settlement expansion is considered a war crime under international law.

The move is being seen by some as an intensification of rhetoric in response to Israel's increasingly aggressive avowals to broaden its settlement enterprise.

In his statement, Burt said he and Foreign Secretary William Hague expressed "condemnation and deep disappointment" at the Jerusalem District Planning and Building Committee's approval of 1,500 housing units in Ramat Shlomo. They also denounced recently announced plans for additional construction in the Givat Hamatos and Gilo neighbourhoods, which are beyond the Green Line.

"These are further profoundly provocative actions that run contrary to the Fourth Geneva Convention," Burt stated. "By taking these steps, despite the international community repeatedly raising our profound concerns, the Israeli government is damaging Israel's international reputation."

Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention states that an occupying power "shall not deport or transfer parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies." This is the basis for the position of international bodies, such as the United Nations and the European Union, to consider Israeli settlements beyond the Green Line illegal under international law.

Violations of the 1949 Geneva Convention are considered war crimes under international law. Israel is a party to the convention and therefore bound by its obligations.

U.K. Minister for the Middle East Alistair Burt

According to pro-Israel advocate Irwin Cotler, a Canadian MPP and a former Canadian justice minister who is an expert on international law, Burt's evoking of the Geneva Convention marks a "gradual ratcheting up" of criticism in light of Israel's increasingly assertive settlement policy. While international human right activists have in the past quoted the convention to incriminate Israel, western government officials have generally refrained from mentioning it in relation to Israeli settlements.

"At first, the settlements were unhelpful, then they became an obstacle to peace; from there they went to being illegal, from there to being contrary to international law, and now they are violating the Geneva Conventions," Cotler told The Times of Israel. "It seems that this signifies a calibrated indictment reciprocal to the increasing affirmations of the Israeli government's settlement policy."

Foreign Ministry spokesperson Yigal Palmor called the British minister's word choice "disappointing."

"The Palestinian interpretation of the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the West Bank and to settlements therein is highly controversial and stands in contradiction with a great number of legal opinions by leading experts," Palmor said.

"It is therefore disappointing to see that a [U.K. Foreign Office] minister should adopt the contested Palestinian position hook, line and sinker, thus adding controversy where it is already in excess."

In trying to fend off such attacks, Israel usually refers to a clause in the convention that says regulations only apply to "high contracting parties" – in other words, signatory states. Since the West Bank and east Jerusalem were not within the recognized territory of any contracting party when Israel captured them, they are to be considered disputed territories rather than occupied, Jerusalem argues.

In May, EU foreign ministers released a statement mentioning "the applicability of the fourth Geneva Convention relative to the protection of civilians." This passage seems to refer mostly to Israel's obligation to safeguard Palestinians living under Israeli military control. On Dec. 10, the EU issued a harshly worded rebuke of Israel's plans to expand settlements in the West Bank but failed to mention the convention.

Burt, a Conservative, also called on the Israeli government to "urgently" reverse its decision to upgrade the Ariel University Center to a full-fledged university. "Ariel is beyond the Green Line in a settlement that is illegal according to international law. This decision will deepen the presence of the settlements in the Palestinian territories and will create another obstacle to peace," he said.

The minister also said that the United Kingdom appreciates the Palestinian leadership's "measured response" to Israel's recent announcements and commended Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas for publicly rejecting recent "inflammatory statements" by Hamas leaders.

Having received non-member observer state status at the United Nations in late November, the Palestinians are said to be considering turning to the International Criminal Court in The Hague to denounce Israel for alleged war crimes relating to settlements.

However, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and other senior government ministers have repeatedly vowed to continue building despite all pressure.

Former intelligence chief warns of 'delegitimization' of Israel

Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — With the chances of a war breaking out in the coming year relatively low, Israel must face up to the graver strategic threat of "delegitimization" in the international arena, a former IDF military intelligence chief warned on Dec. 26.

Amos Yadlin, who now heads the Institute for National Security Studies at Tel Aviv University, explained that Israel's powerful military deterrence would cause Hezbollah, Syria, and even Iran, to think twice before attacking the country. The proof, he said, was that Hezbollah had not fired a shot since the end of the 2006 Second Lebanon War.

"If I had to stand before the cabinet and estimate the chances of a war in 2013, I would say that it seems a campaign against us will not be opened," he said.

However, Yadlin cautioned, the country still faced a "strategic threat" just as pressing as that posed by "rockets and missiles: the threat to our legitimacy in the world and the attempt to turn us into a pariah state."

Still, the Iranian nuclear program, which had seemingly been put on a back burner, would return to the forefront of Israel's security agenda, he predicted, stressing the importance of maintaining a close working relationship with the United States over Tehran.

The statements, quoted on the website of the daily Ma'ariv, were made at a seminar organized by the National Security Studies Center at Haifa University.

When it came to negotiations with the Palestinians, Yadlin argued, both sides would have to make concessions: Israel, for one, would be required to relinquish areas of East Jerusalem.

However, the former intelligence chief said, the Palestinian leadership would be unable to follow through with what was required of it: to declare an end to the conflict and to give up on the "right to return" for refugees and their descendants.

Amos Yadlin

The Palestinians have "homed in on a smart strategy: to wrangle Israeli concessions from the international community without making any concessions themselves," Yadlin said. Thus, instead of relying on the Palestinians, Israel must take its own fate in hand and shape its future unilaterally. The first step, he claimed, should be to make the Palestinians an offer based on parameters set out by former U.S. president Bill Clinton after the failure of the Ehud Barak-Yasser Arafat peace talks he brokered at Camp David in 2000.

"I imagine the Palestinians would reject [the offer], though I would be happy if they accepted it," he said.

Avigdor Liberman indicted for fraud

Former Israeli foreign minister Avigdor Liberman was indicted last week on charges of fraud and breach of trust for allegedly advancing the position of Israel's former ambassador to Belarus in exchange for information on an investigation against him. Israel's Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein submitted the indictment following an extra round of questioning of members of a Foreign Ministry appointments panel. Liberman resigned last month as foreign minister, although he remains a member of the Knesset and the head of the Yisrael Beiteinu party.

Israel eases Gaza blockade

Israel is easing its blockade on Gaza, the Defence Ministry confirmed to local media. Israel will allow previously banned construction material into the coastal strip. The loosening of restrictions comes following the Egyptian-mediated truce in November between the Palestinian leadership in Gaza and Israel that ended Israel's Operation Pillar of Defence. Prior to the truce, only international aid groups could bring in certain construction material. Gravel for construction was scheduled to enter Gaza for the first time in five years. The building materials had been banned due to fears that they would be used to create rockets to be fired at Israel.

Hamas forbids Israeli media contact

The Hamas government in Gaza has forbidden local journalists from working with Israeli media outlets. Hamas decided to ban Palestinian journalists from working "with all Zionist media and journalists." There is no similar requirement in the West Bank under the Palestinian Authority. Hamas has ruled Gaza since 2006.

Spanish Satellite provider bans Iranian news channel

JNS.org

NEW YORK — Two Iranian television channels, including one that recently blamed the Newtown, Conn. school shooting on "Israeli death squads," were banned from Hispasat, a Spanish communication satellites group.

"This is an important development in the worldwide effort to contain the defiant regime in Tehran, one we have been watching carefully for months, and discussing with our friends in Spain," American Jewish Committee (AJC) executive director David Harris said in a statement Dec. 20.

Hispasat terminated the broadcasting of Iran's Press TV and Hispan TV. In its "reporting" on gunman Adam Lanza's murder of 26 people (20 children, six staffers) at Sandy Hook Elementary School, Press TV cited former Arizona gubernatorial candidate Michael Harris – an Arizona-based contributor to the anti-semitic website, Veterans Today – who said Israeli "revenge" and "rage" against the U.S. were behind the shooting. Lanza, the channel said, was Israel's "fall guy."

"This is another case where Israel has chosen violence and terrorism where their bullying in Washington has failed," Press TV quoted Harris as saying.

AJC's Harris said, "No satellite company in the western world should enable the dissemination of propaganda from an Iranian government that denies human rights, supports terror organizations and is determined to achieve nuclear weapons capability."

Israelis skeptical

JNS.org

JERUSALEM — The Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs has released the results of a survey, Views of the Israeli Public on Israeli Security and Resolution of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, showing that 76 per cent of all Israelis and 83 per cent of Jewish Israelis do not believe that a withdrawal to the 1967 lines and a division of Jerusalem would solve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The findings were derived from a representative sample of responses from Israeli adults, gathered by telephone this November.

Also according to the survey results, 61 per cent of Israeli Jews think that it is more important for Israel to have defensible borders than to have peace that would ensure Israel's security. This percentage went up from 49 per cent in 2005.

Seventy-eight per cent of Israeli Jews also said they would change their vote if their preferred political party expresses willingness to relinquish eastern Jerusalem to Palestinian control. Fifty-nine percent of Israeli Jews feel the same way about the Jordan Valley.

Ready. Set. Entertain with Bite Me More

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

"Why wait for the traditional holidays to gather your friends and loved ones together when you can celebrate any day of the year?"

So say the founders of Bite Me More, Jane Apor and sisters Julie Albert and Lisa Gnat. Bite Me More is a lifestyle and entertainment website that encompasses eating, feeding, and easy entertainment at your fingertips.

The company's tag line is "Ready. Set. Go Entertain," and its mission is simple: bring ease to the kitchen and laughs to the table. Albert, Gnat and Apor believe they couldn't possibly let any day, whether Hairdresser Day, National Cookie Day, World Chocolate Day or Talk Like a Pirate Day, pass without celebration. They want everyone to know they are there to help with dependable, doable recipes that will be shared, creative and affordable décor that will be shown, inspiring music that will be recommended, and stylish gifts and fashion that will be culled. Get ready to take a bigger bite out of life.

"Our business evolved out of our bestselling cookbooks Bite Me and Bite Me Too, which Lisa and I wrote together," said Albert. "We wanted to take the Bite Me brand and extend it, and that is where Jane came into the picture. We have created a road map for people who may be intimidated by cooking and by entertaining and have pulled it all together to provide solutions that are easy, affordable, and chic."

The two sisters and Apor launched their Bite Me More website on June 11. They believe the concept is new. "We are hard pressed to find a site that offers the full spectrum of what we offer. Yes, there may be sites out there that offer recipes, perhaps combined with wine, but we are doing the complete combination. This is a new evolution," said Apor.

Bite Me headquarters is located in Albert's home in central Toronto. Each week, the women change their website to work with a theme that includes original recipes supplied by cooking maven Gnat, while Albert and Apor concentrate on the creative side.

"We bring in a photographer to capture our original table setup with editorial shots. We try to give people the big picture and provide a place where our clientele know you don't have to take yourself too seriously," explained Albert.

Bite Me More's target demographic is 25- to 55-year-olds – not just families, but everyone from soccer moms to people who live in lofts and want to entertain friends.

"Part of our motivation is that we grew up in a home with a mom who was an incredible cook. Family meals and gatherings around food were very much ingrained in all of us. Our fondest memories are tied in with food," said Gnat.

The combination of the women's skills, personalities and energy make for a winning business. Albert holds a master's of journalism degree and provides the wit and cleverness behind the words. Gnat earned her pastry papers from George Brown College's culinary arts program, ran a successful dessert catering business and is the deliciousness behind all the recipes. Apor is a "Jane-of-all-trades" who earned an MBA from the Schulich School of Business and who knows pi from pie. She's worked in marketing, product development and event promotion for Estée Lauder in New York and London, and is a jewelry designer as well.

"We're still in the growth phase. It has been six months since inception. We give ourselves another six months to fine-tune. It is an evolution. The site is perfectly designed and lends itself to sponsorship. We are just starting to go after advertisers," Albert said.

"The first several months have been focused on web content as we wanted a site rich in depth. The entertaining and lifestyle sector is a very crowded market place, so we are differentiating ourselves in ways we can and trying to find the right partners along the way."

The ladies are featured regularly as entertaining experts on the Steven and Chris Canadian television talk show, which is syndicated and watched in the United States by 40 million viewers. They also write a weekly column for the news website Huffington Post Canada.

"We are two sisters and a Jane who are celebrating every day with the nation, who get to express ourselves creatively and watch our business expand. We're in it for life," Albert said.

As Apor says, "We try to teach people to turn hay into gold."

Israeli start-up puts fans on arena scoreboards

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — At a game this week, tens of thousands of basketball fans at Nokia Stadium in Tel Aviv have the opportunity to participate in a mass sports trivia game run right on the scoreboard.

Users participate by using a special app that connects them to the scoreboard, where the questions appear. The fans who are fastest to get the right answer up first will have bragging rights, if not fame and fortune, as their Facebook profile photos appear up there for all to see. They'll also get T-shirts, towels and other tchatchkes.

The technology to run such events has been around for a couple of years, but putting together the resources needed to run a successful game where a large crowd interacts with a scoreboard or other large digital sign has usually been more trouble and more expensive than it's worth, said Adir Zimerman, CEO and co-founder of Screemo. The technology being developed by his company, Zimerman said, will enable event sponsors of all kinds to quickly set up mass participatory events for mobile and smartphone users.

"Our platform is the first that allows businesses to implement mobile screens interactive apps within days, and, in many cases, without the help of developers," Zimerman said of the menu-driven system that interfaces with users and with the central screen.

"It could be a scoreboard or a digital sign outside a store," Zimerman said. "Many businesses have wanted to do this for a long time, but it's just been too expensive and time-consuming, since, until now, each event has required writing an application from scratch."

Screemo takes care of much of the back-end work that goes into the applications, and guides users in easily, quickly, and inexpensively setting up their mass event.

There's no doubt that interactive digital signage is going to be very big, Zimerman said, citing a test case that the industry has taken as a signal of things to come – the McDonald's Pong event in Sweden, where, in June 2011, the fast food giant ran an interactive game that pitted players against each other, with the action displayed on a giant billboard. Passersby logged into an app developed by McDonald's, and winners were awarded coupons for free food items. The kicker in that event, Zimmerman said, was the over 30 per cent redemption rate for those coupons, considered a huge advertising coup.

"That event marked the point when interactive digital signage got on the map, and since then, businesses have been looking for ways to duplicate that success," Zimerman said. "They've been frustrated in those efforts until now, but Screemo will without question make it much easier and cheaper for businesses to do interactive digital signage events."

The Nokia Stadium event will not be Screemo's first, as the company has tried out its technology in several bars and restaurants in Tel Aviv over the past several months. But the upcoming event will be the company's biggest so far, kicking off a new level of engagement for Screemo. "And we plan on opening a U.S. sales channel in the coming months," Zimerman said.

Screemo was established in March of this year, and was selected as one of 13 start-ups participating in the second round of companies enrolled in the Microsoft Accelerator for Windows Azure. More than 300 companies applied for the four-month program, which provides start-ups with office space, servers, mentoring and guidance from top professionals, and the opportunity to leverage Microsoft's connections around the world for opportunities.

In the case of Screemo, the fact that the worldwide Young and Rubicam advertising agency is a strategic partner in the accelerator makes the deal even sweeter, since the advertising industry is a main target for Screemo. "There are 22 million digital screens out there in the United States, waiting for interactive content," Zimerman said. "I believe our product will be embraced by the market."

Jeanne Lamon shaped Tafelmusik into a world-class orchestra

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

At the age of three, Jeanne Lamon already knew what she wanted to do for the rest of her life.

As she watched the legendary violinist Isaac Stern perform on television, she pointed a finger toward the screen and exclaimed, "I want to do that!"

Recalling that momentous moment 61 years later, she said, "I just knew I had to play the violin. I saw myself in the violin. It was me."

Although Lamon would not seriously contemplate a career as a violinist until she was a teenager, she realized back then that she had an affinity for that angelic string instrument.

Today, as a new year beckons, Lamon is not only an internationally recognized violinist, but also the music director of the Toronto-based Tafelmusik Baroque Orchestra, one of the leading orchestras of its kind.

She was invited to join the fledgling orchestra by its two founders, Kenneth Solway and Susan Graves. "They wanted to create a world-class orchestra," said Lamon, who had been a concertmaster in a succession of European and North American period orchestras when she was invited to Toronto in 1980.

"I've done that," she said in a factual tone, without the slightest trace of hubris.

Tafelmusik's managing director, Tricia Baldwin, concurs with her assessment. Describing Lamon as "a superb musician, a visionary and a gifted artistic leader," she observed, "For the last 30-plus years, she has taken Tafelmusik to international prominence. She continues to break new ground every day, and does so with a big and genuine heart. We know her legacy will last generations."

When Lamon – the recipient of the Order of Canada in 2000 – arrived in Canada, Tafelmusik, founded in 1979, was little more than a rudimentary organization still in the process of trying to establish a niche for itself. "There was really no orchestra," she said.

But in the past three decades, Tafelmusik, headquartered in the basement of a weathered church in the Annex, near the corner of Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue, has achieved global stature.

Ticking off its achievements, she said, "We've built an audience of over 4,000 subscribers. We've toured the world. We've made well over 80 recordings. Last year, we launched our own independent label, Tafelmusik Media."

Lamon knew that Tafelmusik was on the right track when it signed a recording contract with Sony in 1990. In addition to Sony, Tafelmusik has produced baroque and classical albums for some of the best labels, Analekta, CBC Records, Collegium, Hyperion and BMG.

"We're essentially the only baroque orchestra in Toronto," she said. "Nor is there anything equivalent to us in Canada. We really have a unique orchestra here. Few orchestras do as much as we do."

In her view, the ensemble that probably most resembles Tafelmusik is the Freiburg Baroque Orchestra in Germany.

Tafelmusik consists of 18 musicians, who play the violin, the viola, the cello, the double bass, the harpsichord, the oboe and the bassoon.

Eight of its members have been associated with the orchestra since the early 1980s. "We don't have many personnel changes. People don't leave, realizing how lucky they are to be here. It's a happy group. No one has left in the last eight years. It's the best job in the business."

Lamon conducts, leading from the violin. "We play like a string quartet," she noted. "The violin is an instrument that often leads, and I'm a leader personality. The violin is a beautiful instrument. Some people call it the king of instruments."

Tafelmusk leans heavily toward Bach, Vivaldi, Handel, Mozart and Beethoven. By no coincidence, these composers lived in the 17th and 18th centuries, when western music was in one of its glorious phases. "I love the repertoire of this era," Lamon said.

It comes as no surprise that Lamon's three favourite musicians are, in ascending order, Bach, Mozart and Vivaldi.

"Bach is like Shakespeare. He operates on completely different levels. His music is profound, brimming with hidden meanings and poetic touches. He covers the full gamut of human emotions, from joy to tragedy."

To Lamon, Mozart is nothing less than a genius. "He wrote gorgeous melodies. He had an uncanny ability to write a sad tune with a smile and a happy tune with a tear coming down a cheek. All his music is melodically nuanced."

As for Vivaldi, he captures visual imagery like no one else, she said. "He's very dynamic and energetic."

Lamon, the third of three children in a Dutch Jewish family, ascribes her musicality to her mother. "I got the gene from her, but my father loved opera."

Lamon's father, Isaac, an investment banker of Sephardi origin, and her mother, Elly, a teacher of Ashkenazi descent, left Holland before it was conquered and occupied by Germany in World War II.

Her maternal and paternal grandparents also managed to leave Holland in the nick of time. Lamon's relatives who remained behind were murdered by the Nazis during the Holocaust.

She grew up in Queens, a borough of New York City, and studied music at Brandeis University.

Lamon began to specialize in the baroque violin while studying with Sigiswald Kuijken in Amsterdam in the early 1970s. "I like it more than the modern violin," she explained. "It has a gentler, more expressive tone. It expresses my voice."

From 1971 until she joined Tafelmusik, she worked with period orchestras, including Il Complesso Barocco, Boston Baroque, Studio de Musique Ancienne de Montreal and The Smithsonian Chamber Players of Washington.

She had no hard and fast plan after arriving in Toronto, but "one thing led to another, and I never left."

Now a Canadian citizen, she credits Tafelmusik's stellar reputation, in part at least, to its extensive touring schedule. It's on the road quite often, having performed in venues ranging from Amsterdam's Concertgebouw to London's Barbican Centre.

Beyond Europe, Tafelmusik has toured Asia (China and Taiwan, among other destinations), the United States and Latin America. And it has visited Israel twice.

Almost three months ago, Tafelmusik announced that Lamon would leave her post in 2014 after 33 years at the helm.

In the meantime, she will stay on as music director emerita and continue to build up Tafelmusik's International Baroque Academy, which trains young musicians in master classes.

"Change is inevitable," she said. "I didn't want to step down at the age of 90. Things are in great shape. The orchestra is playing well. Finances are good. Everything is going well. It's the right moment for a great transition."

Lamon intends to continue teaching at the Royal Conservatory of Music, give master classes at the University of Toronto and guest conduct. "They bring me in as the baroque specialist," said Lamon, whose partner in life, Christina Mahler, is Tafelmusik's principal cellist.

Although she is focused on music, she seems like a well-rounded person. She likes to read, take long walks, paddle a canoe, paint and cook.

"I'm pretty eclectic and experimental in the kitchen," said Lamon, who attends gatherings of the Danforth Jewish Circle. "Nothing is more relaxing than cooking."

TORONTO FILMMAKER CASTS LENS ON ISOLATED JEWS OF GHANA

During a volunteer placement in Accra, Ghana in 2010, Toronto-based filmmaker Gabrielle Zilkha sought out a local Jewish community as the Jewish High Holidays neared and discovered the Sefwis.

Situated in the rural village of Sefwi Wiawso, the Sefwis are a small group of Ghanaians who have been observing the Jewish religion for more than 200 years. They observe the Sabbath, circumcise their sons, keep kosher, and recite ritual blessings in Hebrew.

Only in the last 20 years have the Sefwis become aware that their religion was followed by millions of people around the globe known as Jews.

Since returning from her five-month stint in Ghana, Zilkha has become determined to make a feature documentary about the isolated Jews of Ghana, many of whom have also become determined to visit Israel and establish connections with other Jewish communities around the world.

She and her partners also want to use a variety of digital and social media to enable deeper and extended communications between the Sefwi community and people around the world. To this end, Zilkha has begun a fund-raising campaign. For details about the proposed documentary and to view a trailer about the Sefwi community, please visit www.fourcornersthefilm.com

Film examines issue of Nazi-looted art

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The restitution of Nazi-looted art is one of the last dangling, unresolved issues of the Holocaust. But the incident that most probably shaped the contours of this emotional issue revolved around a single, expressive oil painting, Portrait of Wally, which was composed by the Austrian artist Egon Schiele (1890-1918). An exponent of expressionism, he painted it in 1912. Schiele's model, Valerie (Wally) Neuzil, was his mistress.

Portrait of Wally was owned by Lea Bondi, a Jewish art dealer based in Vienna. In 1938, following Germany's takeover of Austria, the canvas was confiscated by Friedrich Welz, one of Bondi's competitors and a Nazi party member.

Bondi tried to reclaim it in the aftermath of World War II, but her efforts were in vain. With Bondi's death in 1969, her heirs doggedly pursued the case.

The painting resurfaced in New York City in 1997, touching off a tumultuous 13-year legal battle between Bondi's relatives and Rudolph Leopold, a Viennese art collector who had bought it in 1954. The wrangling morphed into a cause célèbre, forcing museums to return works of art to their rightful Jewish owners.

Andrew Shea's 90-minute documentary, Portrait of Wally, retells the convoluted story in all its permutations and nuances. It will be screened at the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema (506 Bloor St. W.) on Wednesday, Jan. 9, at 6:30 p.m. and again on Thursday, Jan. 10, at 6:45 p.m.

Once the basic facts are stated, the film unfolds in chronological order, using archival footage and interviews with relevant parties to amplify the issues.

Before Germany annexed Austria, the country was home to about 200,000 Jews, some of whom made enormous contributions to its culture and economy. But Jewish Austrians basically remained outsiders in Austrian society, Shea claims.

Like Berlin, Vienna of the 1920s was a cosmopolitan city, open to new ideas and trends. Bondi thrived in this milieu. But after 1938, everything changed as Austria was Nazified.

After Bondi's art gallery was "Aryanized," Welz demanded Schiele's Wally painting, which had pride of place in her apartment. Bondi had no alternative but to hand it over to him. A day later, she left Austria, never to live there again.

At around this time, Welz pressured Heinrich Rieger – a wealthy Viennese Jew who was eventually deported to a concentration camp – to sell his Schiele collection at a bargain-basement price.

Egon Schiele's Portrait of Wally

At the end of World War II, the U.S. army occupying Austria arrested Welz and turned over the paintings he had illegally acquired to the Austrian government. The Austrian National Gallery then purchased the treasure-trove, including Portrait of Wally, from Rieger's descendants.

Bondi, in the early 1950s, asked Leopold – one of Austria's greatest art collectors – for his help in retrieving Wally. To her everlasting disappointment, she learned that Leopold had bought it for himself.

In 1994, the Austrian government purchased Leopold's immense art collection of 5,400 paintings for $500 million and deposited them in the new Leopold Museum. Leopold claimed that Rieger rather than Bondi had been the proprietor of Portrait of Wally.

The case took a dramatic turn in 1997 when the New York Times disclosed the questionable provenance of Portrait of Wally, one of the Schiele paintings the Leopold Museum had sent on loan for an exhibition to the Museum of Modern Art in New York City.

These developments prompted the Bondi family to contact Robert Morgenthau, the New York county district attorney, who issued a subpoena forbidding Wally's return to Austria.

According to Shea, the Museum of Modern Art's chairman, Ronald Lauder – a Jewish businessman, philanthropist and former U.S. ambassador to Austria – adopted a "cavalier attitude" toward Wally. He apparently feared that global art-lending procedures would be gravely jeopardized by a failure to send back Wally to Austria.

Shea's important, well-crafted film reaches a climax as the Bondi family and the Leopold Museum agree to a financial settlement in lieu of a trial.

He delves deeply into each and every facet of this case, sometimes excessively so, and explains why Portrait of Wally was such a landmark event in the annals of Holocaust restitution.

Web series immerses audiences through interactivity

Ruby Skye P.I. isn't just a television show. The teen-targeted web series blurs the line between fact and fiction, interacting with the viewers between episodes and connecting the story to real life.

Jill Golick, the creator of the program, has built a batch of websites that bring viewers into the story. For example, there are Tumblr accounts for her characters – a microblogging service popular among teenagers – where fans can follow the characters' posts.

The show is at the end of its second season, after releasing an episode a week for nine weeks. Throughout the season, the teen detective protagonist, Ruby Skye, is working on solving the mystery of a haunted library.

To coincide with the show, Golick's production company, Story 2.OH, built a website at odearylibrary.com, which is supposed to be the online version of the haunted library in the show.

The website is designed to look like a real library site, with activities for viewers, such as links to author interviews and book reviews "written" by the characters.

"Each episode stands on its own, but if you want a really deep experience, then you've got a lot of content to explore," she said.

In fact, there's so much to the program that a media studies class at Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School studied it the way they might study a novel, Golick said. As part of the study unit, the students created their own web series and had a mini web-series festival, she said.

Golick, who has worked on several network TV shows for teens and kids, such as Instant Star and Zoboomafoo, co-writes Ruby Skye P.I.

She said one of her goals with the show is to create well-written independent female characters who don't care what other people think of them.

"I don't think we serve our daughters very well with what we put on kids and tween television," she said. "We don't tell them they're smart and capable and can change the world."

That's why she works with Plan Canada's campaign, Because I Am a Girl, which aims to empower women and provide opportunities for girls in developing countries. In the show, Ruby Skye's sister, Hailey, fundraises for the campaign. Golick has even set up a personal page for Hailey on the campaign's website to accept donations.

Although the show is online only, Golick said she thinks the show has higher production values than many network television shows for kids. Most children's shows shoot in a studio and spend around three days per episode. Ruby Skye P.I. shoots an hour's content on location in Toronto over 10 days. The haunted library is shot in University of Toronto's Emmanuel College library.

This show isn't Golick's first time telling a story on the web. More than five years ago, when Facebook had just opened its registration to people outside of university, Golick began a project called boymeetsgrrl.

"I started to think you could tell a television story by using social media and letting characters tell their own stories," she said. She used the classic "boy meets girl" story and created two characters. The boy was a video-blogger who was sharing his story about meeting a girl. Suddenly, she ran into the frame and told him he had given her an STI (sexually transmitted infection).

A Facebook account was created for the female character, where she would post notes asking people what she should do about the situation, and within 24 hours, people from all over the world became engrossed in the storyline, suggested diagnoses for whatever he had given her, and giving her relationship advice.

"It's such a surprise as a storyteller that people are participating in this way," Golick said. "They hated the guy. They said to her, 'Get rid of him.'"

Although she tried to make it obvious that the story and characters were fictional, she said not everybody figured it out.

"There's definitely a blurring of fact and fiction when you move into the web-space," she said, adding that the vast majority knew it was a work of fiction, but some people got very upset.

Ruby Skye P.I.'s characters have been much more obviously fiction. All the photos have a logo on them, and the characters don't interact with people in a real way.

However, given that online media is growing all the time, viewers should remember that not everything they find online is true.

Although there are several challenges that come with producing a web series – particularly in financing and finding an audience – Golick has been very successful. The number of views hit the one million mark recently, and they had one day with 100,000 views.

However, there's still a long way to go. That number is still quite small compared to network television shows.

"I think it's going to be a while before the web is mature enough to support this kind of a narrative, dramatic story," Golick said, but her experience shows that young people are not afraid of new kinds of content. The web is the right marketplace for a show for teenagers, she said.

Einstein's ambivalent relationship with Zionism

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The renowned scientist Albert Einstein had an ambivalent relationship with Zionism, a topic Ze'ev Rosenkranz expertly explores in Einstein Before Israel: Zionist Icon or Iconoclast? (Princeton University Press).

Rosenkranz is well positioned to delve into this subject, being senior editor of the Einstein Papers Project at the California Institute of Technology and a former curator of the Albert Einstein Archives at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

In this comprehensive account of Einstein's association with the Zionist movement, he examines the years from 1919 to 1933, an extremely important period in Einstein's life. A German Jew, Einstein burst onto the world stage in 1919 after British astronomers verified his landmark general theory of relativity. With Adolf Hitler's rise to power in 1933, he left Germany once and for all and settled in Princeton, N.J.

Born in Ulm, in the southern state of Wurttemberg, Einstein was a victim of childhood antisemitism. The only Jewish pupil in his elementary school class, he was taunted by antisemitic students about his physiognomy. Their biting barbs left an impression, as did Einstein's failure to find a job in academia after graduating from the Zurich Polytechnic in 1900. Rosenkranz speculates that his Jewishness may have been the reason he was the only one in his class not to land a teaching position after graduating.

In 1909, after working at the Swiss Patent Office in Bern and expressing concern that his "semitic appearance" might jeopardize his career, he finally secured a job as a physics professor at the University of Zurich. Within a year, he was offered a full professorship at the German University in Prague, the home of budding novelist Franz Kafka.

Einstein's first recorded encounter with Zionists occurred in Prague. He was neither influenced nor ideologically impressed by them, Rosenkranz writes. Indeed, Einstein disparagingly called them "medieval and unworldly people."

Einstein, having adopted Swiss citizenship in 1901, moved to Berlin in 1914, a few months before the outbreak of World War I, to take up a posting at the Prussian Academy of Sciences.

Shortly afterward, he rejected an invitation from the Imperial Academy of Sciences in St. Petersburg to visit Russia, saying he was upset by the "brutal manner" in which my "ethnic comrades are being persecuted." This was most likely a reference to the notorious blood libel trial of Menahem Mendel Beilis.

Rosenkranz suggests that Einstein's attitude toward Zionism crystallized in 1919, when he told Kurt Blumenfeld, a prominent Zionist in Germany, that he was ready to work for the Zionist cause. These events coincided with his divorce from his first wife, the Serbian Mileva Maric, and his marriage to his cousin, Elsa.

Einstein supported Zionism despite his general opposition to nationalism, explaining that his acceptance of Jewish nationalism was a way of dealing with his rootlessness as a Jew in Weimar, Germany.

Zionism appealed to him on an emotional level, according to Rosenkranz. "He sensed that this was a movement that could further some of the goals of utmost importance to him: the creation of a refuge for Jews from eastern Europe and the elevation of the self-esteem of his fellow Jews in the West so that they could overcome their 'servile disposition' toward their host countries."

To Einstein, Jews could only earn the respect of non-Jews by daring "to view themselves as a nation." He subscribed to the belief, shared by German Zionists, that Jews should focus on their own national dignity rather than on antisemitism. Zionism, he noted, offered "the Jewish people joy in [their] own existence."

Yet, as Rosenkranz observes, Einstein's pro-Zionist stance was also a function of his interest in establishing a university in Jerusalem to fulfil the educational needs of the Jewish population in Palestine and to provide jobs for Jewish refugees from eastern Europe. The Hebrew University of Jerusalem would be the fulfillment of this dream.

In 1921, Einstein accepted an invitation from Chaim Weizmann, the president of the World Zionist Organization, to join him on a fundraising tour of the United States on behalf of the Hebrew University. In summarizing the strenuous two-month trip, Einstein informed a close friend that the journey had given him "the great satisfaction of having been very useful to the Zionist cause and of having assured the founding of the [Hebrew] university."

Two years later, Einstein visited Palestine for the first time. Arriving via the Egyptian city of Port Said, he was welcomed to Jerusalem by the British high commissioner, Sir Herbert Samuel. After a round of city tours and receptions, including a tour of Mount Scopus, the Jewish National Library and the Bezalel Art Academy, he proceeded to Tel Aviv, where he was greeted by its first mayor, Meir Dizengoff.

Einstein subsequently visited the Mikve Israel agricultural school and the town of Rishon LeZion before boarding a train for Haifa, where he paused at the Technion. From Haifa, he embarked on a tour of the Galilee, visiting the Nahalal co-operative farm (where the future Israeli general and defence minister Moshe Dayan was raised), Tiberias and the Sea of Galilee.

Einstein was impressed by the dynamic, entrepreneurial spirit of the Yishuv, the Jewish community of Palestine. He concluded that while "Palestine will not solve the Jewish problem, the revival of Palestine will mean the liberation and revival of the Jewish soul."

Although he was acutely aware of Jewish-Arab tensions in Palestine, he downplayed its potential explosiveness, Rosenkranz says. But after the director of the Jewish National Fund called for the removal of the Arab inhabitants of Palestine, following deadly clashes in the summer of 1929 that claimed 133 Jewish and 116 Arab lives, Einstein was appalled.

He wanted the Zionist leadership to take a conciliatory approach to the majority Arab population: "If we do not succeed in finding a path of sincere co-operation… with the Arabs, then we will have learned nothing from our 2,000-year-old ordeal and will deserve the fate that will await us."

Disillusioned with mainstream Zionist policy on Arab-Jewish relations, Einstein drifted into the dovish Brith Shalom camp. In a stunning comment in support of a binational entity, he declared, "I should much rather see reasonable agreement with the Arabs on the basis of living together in peace than the creation of a Jewish state."

Rosenkranz writes that Einstein reserved his greatest hope for his pet project, the Hebrew University, which to him represented "the quintessence of his expectations from Zionism: academic brilliance, personal integrity, ethnic solidarity and the pure pursuit of scholarly truth."

But even on this level, Einstein was to be disappointed. "His perception of the intolerance demonstrated toward supporters of Brith Shalom at the university further alienated him from developments on the ground in Jerusalem," Rosenkranz observes.

Due to the Holocaust, the creation of Israel and the first Arab-Israel war, however, Einstein would be preoccupied with the Zionist movement until his death in 1955.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

King David Stars play Goliaths of Toronto soccer

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you thought playing soccer in the blustery, bone-chilling conditions of November was tough, then December ought to be – a lot warmer.

That's when they move the game indoors, so instead of bundling up against the cold, the boys and girls of the King David Stars Academy will continue their soccer training in ideal conditions. Soccer, it turns out, is something like hockey in that it has become a 12-month sport, with aficionados heading indoors when the weather does not permit them to play outside.

Inside, they play futsal, a brand of soccer developed in Latin America that features a smaller ball. "It's lightning quick, it teaches close control, skill and quick thinking," said Martin Scott, who co-owns the Academy. "Playing that in the winter makes the outdoor game so much better."

The 60 members of the academy's "elite" section – there are another 40 in the "incubator," the development division – will play in the Driftwood Hispanic Soccer League (DHSL). That's one of the city's most competitive circuits, which has produced a number of professional players, Scott said. The King David Stars Academy will field four teams, ranging in age from four- and five-year-olds to 10- and 11-year-olds.

The boys and girls generally really are Davids compared to the Goliaths they compete against, said Scott, who operated the Maccabi Toronto soccer program for 32 years. Opponents are usually much bigger and sometimes older, as the academy often puts younger players with older ones to speed their development, and where their skills warrant, he said.

Martin Scott

Going into the winter season, Scott believes he has reason for optimism. At the tail end of the outdoor season, playing in the SAAC (Soccer Academy Alliance Canada), his 2004 boys (the date refers to their year of birth) outperformed all other academy teams. They were the best among Toronto teams in a season-ending tournament and lost in a penalty shootout to a loaded guest team from outside the city, Scott said.

Scott attributes the success of the academy teams to the challenging training regimen and the quality coaching provided. His partner, Boris Krimus, is the head coach.

Krimus played professionally in Israel and Russia in both countries' elite leagues. A former defender, he specializes in the technical aspects of the game – everything from breathing properly during runs to striking the ball most effectively, Scott said.

Other coaches include Raphael Fell, who played for North York Hearts, and Dejan Vugrincic, a former Yugoslav professional.

The kids in the academy's elite program practise four times a week and play one game, Scott said. SAAC was flexible enough to schedule the academy's games on Sunday, allowing Orthodox players to participate, he added.

The academy approach differs from the one practised by more traditional club teams, Scott continued. "This model has more focus on developing the individual player, not necessarily on the team."

Academy players play a more possession game, something like the Spanish world champions, who feature a lot of quick, short passes.

"We try to focus on developing the most difficult position, the creative midfielder," he said. "The first thing we do is train kids to pass the ball and change their focus to passing, moving and doing something else."

Popularized by the Dutch team, Ajax, the academy approach was transplanted to Barcelona by 1970s Dutch superstar Johan Cruyff.

It's that style that permits the sometimes undersized King David teams to get the better of their bigger opponents, Scott said.

Greenberg signs minor league deal with the Orioles

JTA

BALTIMORE, Md. — Jewish player Adam Greenberg gets a chance to resume his professional baseball career after signing a minor league deal with the Baltimore Orioles.

Greenberg, 31, has signed a minor-league contract with the Orioles and will work to get a spot on their Class AAA farm team in Norfolk, Va.

Chosen by the Chicago Cubs in the ninth round of the 2002 draft, Greenberg was beaned in his only Major League at-bat, as a pinch-hitter on July 9, 2005. He suffered a concussion.

The Cubs released Greenberg in June 2006. After that, he played in the minor leagues with the Los Angeles Dodgers, Kansas City Royals and Cincinnati Reds. He spent 2009, 2010 and 2011 playing for the Bridgeport Bluefish of the independent Atlantic League.

Greenberg's story resurfaced in September when he was tapped to replace the injured Gabe Kapler for Team Israel in the World Baseball Classic qualifiers in Jupiter, Fla. In his only at-bat of the qualifiers, Greenberg walked against South Africa and scored on a single by Shawn Green coupled with an error.

At approximately the same time, an online campaign called "One at Bat" had fans rallying for Greenberg to be given another shot at the majors. Greenberg was offered the second chance on Sept. 28 when the Marlins surprised him with a one-day contract announced live on NBC's Today show. He struck out as a pinch hitter in a game against the New York Mets, but returned to the dugout smiling and was greeted by high fives and hugs from his Marlins teammates for the day.

"To get the opportunity with the Orioles means everything to me," he said.

Community professional balances eclectic interests, demanding job

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Mindy Eklove never expected to end up as a Jewish community professional.

A student of nutrition who writes a food blog in her spare time, Eklove also devotes three nights a week to muay thai boxing and has acted in two independent films.

The 31-year-old – who grew up in Montreal, as the third of six children in a tightly knit modern Orthodox family – moved to Toronto in May 2007 to work for Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA (then UIA Federations Canada) as national director of young leadership.

In 2011, she also became director of coast-to-coast Israel and overseas.

She balances a demanding job that involves a lot of travel by being "really good with time management," she said in an interview in her office at the Lipa Green Centre. "I come in early, usually before 7:30, and... I stay late if needed, or come in on Sunday."

But she doesn't work late often, she added. "I'm very organized, despite the organized mess," she said, referring to the untidy piles of paper on her desk. "I'm extremely type A. I get things done. I get them done fast. I'm very efficient and detail-oriented... I also tend to surround myself with things I love, and I do better."

In November, at the General Assembly of Jewish Federations of North America in Baltimore, Eklove received a young professionals' award from the Jewish Communal Service Association of North America (JCSA).

In her speech at the award presentation, she said that joining the B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) as a teenager changed her life.

Eklove became a member after a Grade 9 trip to Israel with Herzliah High School, when she became friends with some girls who belonged to the organization.

She went on to become regional president, and later – beginning as a part-time job when she was a theatre student at Concordia University – she became regional director for the Eastern Canada region of BBYO. "The teenagers were fantastic. We had a great time," she said.

At the same time, she was teaching Jewish history and heritage at afternoon schools and in a Jewish heritage program at a local elementary school.

Her former boss, Linda Kislowicz, now CEO of Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA, suggested that she apply for the federation job in Toronto.

Eklove had no previous involvement in the Jewish federation world and knew little about it, she said.

She spent the first few months on the job familiarizing herself with the system and visiting the affiliated communities, "then forged ahead."

It helped that she had "a really strong support system," including Kislowicz and Michael Soberman, UIA's director of national initiatives for the next generation, who had hired her.

"I'm a really strong believer in mentorship," she said. "I hope I'll be able to do that in the future."

Soberman, who nominated Eklove for the JCSA award, told The CJN that although Eklove was relatively young and "didn't have tons of experience" when he met her, he was "blown away by her enthusiasm, passion and ability to take on new challenges."

Eklove, in turn, credits Soberman and her father, Charles, as her two biggest influences. In her acceptance speech, Eklove described her father as "one of the smartest and most Jewishly educated people I know."

At home, she told The CJN, her dad "always talked about Jewish values... and would encourage us to do the same."

Denominationally, she describes herself as "non-practising Orthodox. That's what I identify with and what makes the most sense to me. It's not the lifestyle I want now, but it's the one I believe in the most."

As a child growing up in Hampstead, Eklove was at home for family dinners "every single night, and Friday was special." As well, there were family activities such as charades or board games every weekend.

Family comes first, Eklove said. "You have to understand what is important and what isn't. I work with deadlines. If I have to miss a yoga class to meet my deadlines, I do. I'm scheduled, but also flexible enough that when things come up, I can handle them."

That ability stood her in good stead recently when she was working toward her master's degree in Jewish professional services from Spertus College in Chicago.

Eklove said it's a privilege for her to see the impact that federation funds have on people's lives. "It's my job," she said. "But it's a privilege."

Unlike some people who work at high-intensity careers and suffer burnout, Eklove said she has become more enthusiastic and more excited to come to work. Her job "just gets more interesting."

Because she had much to learn at the beginning, she feels that now she is able to focus on "things that really matter. That makes this job really incredible.

"I always wanted to do something that changed people's lives. To be able to do that for the Jewish community is being able to marry a lot of the values I hold dear."

Trying not to judge

Dear Ella,

Every new year, I try to improve on one thing. I don't like to call it a New Year's resolution, but that's pretty much what it is. I should let you know that I'm rarely successful at any of my commitments, except once I did actually quit smoking.

This year, however, I'm going to attempt a real toughy. I'm going to make an effort to not judge people. Usually, I'm extremely judgmental, not only assuming things about complete strangers based on their appearance, but also judging friends and family about the way they choose to run their lives, and often their kids' lives.

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

I'm single, have never been married and have never had children, but somehow I seem to know what makes sense in certain situations, and I often feel like conking someone over the head and saying, "Are you nuts?" Situations seem so clear to me and yet I see people I care about making the most ridiculous life decisions. But no more! This is the year I put a stop to that. I'm setting myself up for failure, aren't I?

No More Judging

Dear No More Judging,

A toughy indeed. At least you've been able to identify an uncomplimentary trait and are making an effort to fix it. Will you be successful? Time, awareness and practice will tell.

It's difficult not to be judgmental. Almost everyone does it without even realizing it. If people are honest, they'll admit to judging the young man wearing fairly new Nikes at a red light holding up a sign for money, or a group of teenage boys wearing hoodies and baggy pants, or the guy in the luxury sedan talking on his cellphone who just cut them off in traffic, or even the mom of the screaming kid in the grocery store. We make these judgments even though we've never met the person or have no idea of the situation. We also make judgments about friends and family – perhaps a friend who doesn't work, or a parent whose teen has gone wild or a cousin who's overweight, or even a nasty boss or co-worker.

Maybe the guy who cut you off just found out his child has been rushed to the hospital. Maybe your friend isn't working because he or she is depressed, afraid or dealing with another emotional problem.

There's a very fine line between snap judgment and reasoned opinion. The type of judgment you're referring to comes from a quick, reactive thought, based on your own life experience and ego. A reasoned opinion is more thought-driven and leaves the door open for discussion. Snap judgments are finite, closed, automatic and made based on the way you've conducted your own life and how you feel about yourself.

To be successful, start with never assuming you know what's going on in someone's life, and never jump to conclusions. I commend you on attempting to fix this difficult habit. It may not be possible to stop judging completely, but every time you catch yourself, you'll have become a little bit of a better person.

Remember, others are judging you, too, so this may be one of those times when what goes around, comes around.

The CJN's French-language reporter in Montreal, Elias Levy, writes about:

The Canadian Council for Public-Private Partnerships (CCPPP) which has awarded the Centre hospitalier de l'Université de Montréal (CHUM), the Collectif Santé Montréal and Infrastructure Québec the 2012 Gold Prize for financing construction of the new CHUM.

The recent gala of the Canadian Friends of Migdal Ohr, where Rabbi Yitzchak Grossman, chief rabbi of Migdal HaEmek, founder and dean of Migdal Ohr educational institutions, talked about the work the school does to help disadvantaged children in Israel.

Former Winnipegger creates financial guide for North Americans considering aliyah.

In Jamaica you can swim with dolphins and pray in a sanctuary with a sand-covered floor.

The Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre is urging the Canadian government to remove Hungary and possibly other eastern European countries from the list of designated "safe" countries of origin created by the new Protecting Canada's Immigration System Act, formerly known as the omnibus refugee Bill C-31.

Whom can you trust with end-of-life decisions?

It is almost a given that older individuals invariably appoint their children to be their substitute decision-makers when they set out to create a power of attorney for personal care, whether or not it includes an advance directive known colloquially as a "living will."

The understandable assumption is this: who can you trust to better fulfil your most important decisions about end-of-life care than your most cherished family members? It's one thing if you have never communicated your wishes to your children, something I suggest is a serious abrogation of crucial communication. It's another if, after you have expressed your deep-felt wishes, your children choose to reinterpret or apparently ignore your instructions for their own personal reasons or values.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

I am not referring to the unfortunately common phenomenon of what family therapists may refer to as "dysfunctional families" of which there seem to be a wide spectrum, but to the fact that varying degrees of family strife and conflict are not uncommon. I am concerned as much about apparently fully functional and ostensibly loving and respectful families who become dissociated from those they are supposed to represent when important decisions have to be made, and couch their decisions in terms of apparent psychological conflict. This type of conflict is often called "moral distress" when health-care professionals find that they are acting on decision-making processes that conflict deeply with their professional and personal values.

I have had cases where the older patient's wishes that my colleagues and I were asked to comment on appeared to be clearly expressed and documented but were overridden or ignored by apparently loving and devoted children. A commonly repeated scenario is that an older person writes a living will in the presence of a responsible legal advisor and has consistently indicated a mentally competent wish to not have a permanent feeding tube provided under defined circumstances.

Yet, the children end up requesting that such a tube be inserted even in the face of the apparently contradictory instructions. This often occurs in late-stage dementia or other brain diseases where the level of mental interaction with those the person loves will never return to any semblance of function acceptable to them.

I have heard children claim, even in the face of very clear instructions about not wishing permanent artificial nutrition and hydration (a feeding tube) in a well-documented living will, that they "cannot bring themselves to make that decision," or that they "could not live with themselves in making such a decision."

I have witnessed cases that eventually get referred to the legal tribunal that adjudicates such situations. Then, even in the face of a decision that upholds the living will instructions, the family pursues all other legal means possible to allow them to not carry out the wishes of their parent. These cases often involve families that espouse love and devotion as the reason for their failure to follow the instructions.

What is the solution, short of designating a non-family member you can trust as your substitute decision-maker, someone who is not intimately involved emotionally in the necessary decisions? At a minimum, you need to to discuss your wishes with your loved ones and have them assure you as much as anyone can that they understand what you are asking and that they are willing and able to respect your wishes, even if these wishes may be in conflict with their own beliefs, values and emotional capabilities.

One-third of Israelis still undecided: poll

Election less than two weeks away

Stephan Miller
The Times of Israel

A new pre-election poll conducted exclusively for The Times of Israel shows that a remarkable 31 per cent of likely voters in the Jan. 22 Israeli elections remain undecided.

The perceptions, ideology and demographics of that undecided bloc lean slightly more to the centre-left than to the right, suggesting that the final two weeks of the campaign may see a narrowing of the gap between the right-wing and centre-left blocs. It may be that the profusion of centre-left parties has resulted in a relatively substantial proportion of centre-left voters weighing their options even at this late stage.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's centre-right Likud-Beiteinu will still almost certainly win the most seats, and will almost certainly be better placed than the centre-left parties to build the next coalition, the survey indicates, but the margins of his victory may well be narrower than most recent polls have suggested, and his coalition dilemmas more complex.

For more election coverage, see pages 9 and 34

Formulated by The Times of Israel and the political consultancy firm (202) Strategies, with field work conducted by TRI-Strategic Research between Dec. 25 and Jan. 2, the survey is the most accurate publicly available poll to date, having questioned a relatively large sample of 803 likely voters – as opposed to the Hebrew media's norm of 500 eligible voters. Of those 803, also in contrast to the Hebrew media norm, 10 per cent of The Times of Israel surveys were conducted by cellphone, and another 10 per cent were conducted in Arabic.

The poll shows the Likud-Beiteinu alliance at 34 seats after the undecideds have been factored in on a proportional basis, Shelly Yachimovich's Labor party rising to 21, a strong Jewish Home (Habayit Hayehudi) under the leadership of recently elected party leader Naftali Bennett at 15, and a falling Hatnua party under Tzipi Livni at six. Deeper analysis of the survey's findings, however, suggests that the undecideds may not ultimately divide proportionately, and that a slightly greater proportion of them are wavering between the various centre-left and left-wing parties, rather than between the right-wing parties.

Respondents were asked who they would vote for if elections were held that day. Likely voters representing a full 31 per cent of the electorate – or 37 seats in the 120-member Knesset – said they did not yet know. Another five per cent said they would vote for parties that would not come close to receiving the two per cent of the popular vote required to claim a Knesset seat – including Am Shalem, Otzma Leyisrael and Kadima.

Jubilee Medals

WINNIPEG — Three members of the Jewish community were presented with the Queen's Diamond Jubilee Medals recently. Larry Vickar, Ivan Berkowitz and Joseph Wilder were recognized for their support of a wide variety of charities and community involvement. The medal was created to mark the 2012 celebrations of the 60th anniversary of Queen Elizabeth's accession to the throne.

WORLD

Al Jazeera in U.S.A.

NEW YORK —The Al Jazeera news network has purchased Current TV, the cable outlet founded by former vice-president Al Gore and intends to start a U.S.-based news channel. The sale price was not disclosed, but it is estimated to be up to $500 million (U.S.). Time Warner Cable, which reaches about 12 million homes in the United States, said it was terminating its contract to carry Current TV. Current also is distributed by Comcast Corp. and DirecTV, with 22.4 million and 19.8 million subscribers, respectively. The new Al Jazeera channel will begin airing this year. Al Jazeera is owned by the government of Qatar.

A Mufti in Gaza

SYDNEY — Leading a delegation of Australian sheiks, the mufti of Australia visited Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh in the Gaza Strip, triggering condemnation from the country's Jewish community and a potential government probe. Dr. Ibrahim (Abu Mohammed) Salem said he wanted to learn "steadfastness, sacrifice and the defence of one's rights" from Hamas leaders. The military wing of Hamas is listed as a proscribed terrorist organization by the Australian government. Australia's Department of Foreign Affairs said authorities would investigate any allegations of unlawful behaviour.

Trees to Memorialize Shooting Victims

NEW YORK — More than 2,000 people have donated funds to plant a grove of more than 3,000 trees in Israel in memory of the victims of the Sandy Hook Elementary School shooting in Newtown.

Hadassah has raised more than $61,000 (U.S.) toward the planting of trees honouring the 26 victims of the Dec. 14 massacre. The trees will be part of the Be'er Sheva River Park, a 1,700-acre water, environmental and commercial area being constructed by the Jewish National Fund in Israel's desert city.

The idea for the Newtown grove grew from a request by Veronique Pozner, whose son, Noah, was the only Jewish victim of the shooting at the Connecticut school. Pozner said memorial contributions could be directed toward the planting of trees in Israel.

The president of Hadassah, Marcie Natan, said her organization decided it wanted to honour all the victims of the massacre, not just Noah.

"Everybody was so affected by the massacre and wanted to do something to express their solidarity with the families," Natan said. "Each of us have had the experience of non-Jews who have found it very meaningful when a tree is planted in the Holy Land."

Oscar Says No

LOS ANGELES — Israel's 2012 Academy Award entry failed to make the list of nine semifinalists among foreign-language films. Israel's entry, Fill the Void, was eliminated, and the country's Oscar hopes now rest in the documentary feature category, where The Gatekeepers, from director Dror Moreh, and 5 Broken Cameras, a collaboration between Emud Burnat and Guy Davidi, a Palestinian and an Israeli respectively, are among the 15 semifinalists.

Mother and son seek kidney transplants

HAMILTON — Arie Pekar was fooling around one day with his mom's blood pressure machine when he discovered his reading was exceptionally high.

His mom, Ilana, has a blood pressure machine because she was then doing home dialysis for polycystic kidney disease (PKD), which causes cysts to develop and interfere with the organ's ability to filter waste from the blood. Very high blood pressure is an early sign of this genetic disease.

Arie was tested and, at age 21, he found out he had inherited the condition.

Because Arie was diagnosed early and while he was in good health, doctors were optimistic about his prognosis. But despite preventive treatments and a healthy lifestyle, his disease is progressing quickly.

The Dundas, Ont., resident, now 33, was told about a year ago to prepare for a kidney transplant.

Friends and family have been tested and ruled out. His brother, Joshua, 30, is a perfect match. Over almost a year, he passed all screening tests to be able to donate a kidney to Arie – except for one. Although Joshua does not have PKD, doctors say his kidneys don't function perfectly. While this will most likely not affect his health, it prohibits him from being a donor.

"This was a devastating shock," said Ilana. "Joshua was so gung-ho on doing this for Arie, who was banking on it. My concern is for Arie to get a kidney before dialysis. In the meantime, his kidneys are declining. We don't know what will happen.

"I welcome anything toward myself, but it's very difficult to see him burdened by this."

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

A grandmother's blessing

Twenty-five years ago today my grandmother passed away. In commemoration of her yahrzeit, I reproduce an article that first appeared on Feb. 5, 1987.

From the editor's desk...

It is through the interplay of life's opposites that we gain insight into ourselves.

We are moved by this reflection because in the silence of still moments, we understand very clearly that this is the truth of the human condition.

With my young children, I recently went to visit my grandmother, a lovely woman, an old woman, a woman of 90. Unlike the opposites that are found in nature, there was no subtlety to the juxtaposition of opposites in this instance. My daughters, in the very dawn of their lives, their senses, their energy, their vitality awakening daily to unlimited possibilities. My grandmother, in the same room, struggling with dusk, depleted of physical essence, her life force receding. For her, no possibilities are left.

The real pathos of growing old is losing faith in one's possibilities. The day that she entered the nursing home is the day that she lost that faith.

As a rule, it is difficult to engraft the obligations of one's heart upon the hearts of one's children. After all, one person's loves may be another person's chores. This is ever more so the case when the parent's heart is deeply obliged to an enfeebled, blind, old woman whose very appearance, simply, is unsettling to the youngsters. And yet, this old woman is my grandmother, the mother of my mother, the woman whose home was my home, whose arms were my arms, whose laughter was my laughter, whose love was my love. But she will never be to my children what she was to me; nor can I make it so. Knowing this, I ache.

When we arrive at the nursing home, the children cling to each other and to me. They are frightened, frankly, by the faces, the sounds, the gestures, the misshapen postures of so many of the people, who, from their wheelchairs, greet them with curiosity in the main lobby. All eyes focus upon the four young little curly tops who have entered their home. This merely quickens the pace of the girls. We go directly to the elevator. It smells unmistakably, though faintly, of dried urine. The girls look at each other, then at me, in silent acknowledgment of the fact.

The same faces, the same sounds, the same gestures, the same postures, though of different persons, are assembled in a concave congregation of wheelchairs and walkers as we emerge from the elevator.

The girls still hold tightly to each other.

We enter my grandmother's room, her home. She is standing slightly bent over, holding on to her walker.

She is inclined toward the doorway, but she is not walking. Her look is toward the doorway, but she does not see.

I call out to her. I call her name. I announce my arrival loudly, affectionately.

Like a strong, reviving breeze into a limp sail, the sound of my voice immediately straightens her up. More to herself than to me, in a sighing whisper, she says my name twice.

"I have the girls with me. They came to see you. They wanted to come."

I walk quickly, directly to her. I kiss her on the forehead and in her hair. I hold her face in my hands, tracing and caressing its gaunt, taut shape with my fingers. Her eyes close as I touch her. She places a hand over mine as it presses lightly upon her skin. She is still standing. And the children are carefully watching my love for my grandmother.

She can only see the shapes of the four young visitors who are now standing in a tiny cluster at her side. She cannot see their faces. She reaches for them, asking me to identify each child for her as she settles her hands upon a child's shoulders.

Miraculously, without instruction, each child steps forward without hesitation to embrace and be embraced by this very old woman, to kiss her and to offer up the sound of her voice and the touch and contact of her body. They have left their fear in the hallway and for this I am truly grateful.

I guide my grandmother to the largest chair in her one-room home. I sit down beside her. I do not let go of her hand. The girls hover around us, close enough to my grandmother that she is constantly touching them and "staring" at them and even laughing.

The conversation is quite secondary to the occasion although it is unceasing. There are no silent moments because silence is the woman's normal companion. For now, this very short time being, I her grandson and my four children, are her companions.

Inevitably, our visit must end.

I whisper to my grandmother that it is time for me to take the girls home. I cannot hide my melancholy. She senses this.

"Bring the little girls forward so that I may bless them."

Like Joseph at his father's final bedside, I present each of the girls, one at a time, for the invocation of my grandmother's blessing.

Each in her turn, a little girl approaches her. My grandmother embraces them and kisses them one at a time. She carefully speaks her words of promise and of possibility to each girl in a language none of the children understands.

The tears are in my eyes alone.

Outside, as we leave the building, my grandmother's home, the girls run and skip to the car parked close by.

I walk slowly, now alone with my fear.

And the person for whom I fear, I have just left behind.

(One year later, my grandmother passed away.)

Jews for Judaism goes digital in its fight

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Julius Ciss and Rabbi Michael Skobac are well-known among "messianic Jews," and when Ciss showed up at a recent program in a seniors residence, organizers asked him to leave.

For years, Ciss and Rabbi Skobac have been monitoring the activities of organizations targeting Jews, showing up at their meetings and conferences with a counter-message: that the "messianic" community is not offering Jews a different way to fulfil their Judaism, but are enticing people to adopt the Christian faith.

What particularly concerns them is the "deceptive" manner in which recruitment is conducted: the flyer advertising the Chanukah program made no mention of the fact that the sponsor was a Christian organization. In fact, they say, in keeping with Christian outreach efforts to Jews, it misleadingly makes it appear the event is Jewish, when it's not.

"We want to show people that it's not a Jewish event," Ciss said in an interview in Jews for Judaism's cramped quarters. "It's a missionary event."

Though the event included Jewish traditions, like lighting candles and singing songs, the missionaries provide followup literature hoping to entice participants into, eventually, "believing in Jesus," Ciss said.

Displaying plenty of chutzpah, Ciss stood at a window outside the room, holding a sign informing participants that the event they were attending was not really kosher.

Though Jews for Judaism Canada employed a low-tech message on that occasion, it has increasingly turned to more up-to-date digital formats to counter missionary activities.

Evangelists have already adopted Facebook and Twitter to recruit. "They see it as incredibly fertile grounds for them," Rabbi Skobac said. Their spin is to position Jesus as the full and final expression of Judaism and not as an alternative religion.

Jews for Judaism has placed a video on YouTube addressing that argument. It has paid for an ad on Google that takes viewers to YouTube with videos by Rabbi Skobac. "We're getting incredible results," he said, with 120,000 views in April alone and more than 50,000 on KosherTube.

Rabbi Skobac, who had to "get schlepped onto Facebook," now has 4,300 friends. "We do a lot of Jews for Judaism work through Facebook. We get 10 inquiries a day through our Facebook portal," he said.

Using 21st-century media techniques helps Jews for Judaism keep the fight on a level playing field, but Ciss and Rabbi Skobac believe missionary groups are deceptive in their fundamental message. They wouldn't otherwise leave out the sponsoring group when they publicize ostensibly Jewish events.

"It's not making it clear that it's a Christian organization trying to convert you to Christianity," Rabbi Skobac said.

Chosen People Ministries recently held a training session, and "many of this year's participants are Filipinos, many of them caregivers in Jewish homes and senior residences," Rabbi Skobac said.

"We've always known that missionaries target seniors and people in nursing homes. Caregivers who are proselytizing is going on worldwide. These are people who are often religious" and want to share their beliefs. "They don't want that poor old Jewish person to go to hell if they don't embrace Jesus," he said.

"Missionaries see caregivers as potential recruiters to target people who are vulnerable," he added. "We're not trying to create a panic, to imply that all Filipino caregivers are a problem, just to make people aware this is going on."

There are some 180 missionary groups operating in North America, including some that consist of Jews who've converted. "It is not diminishing," Ciss said.

"It is not as if these people are trying but not succeeding," Rabbi Skobac continued. "It's a lot of work to convert the small numbers of people converting."

Sometimes the effort begins innocuously enough, with missionaries spending time in coffee shops in Jewish neighbourhoods, reading their Bibles and trying to start conversations about Scripture. Another tactic is to send a couple of dozen missionaries to the annual Walk for Israel. They'd wear a T-shirt that stated, "Ask me about my rabbi," or "I love (using a heart) Yeshua," the Hebrew name for Jesus.

When it comes right down to it, the primary message of missionaries is not one of biblical interpretation. "Our experience has been that generally Jews don't convert to Christianity because of what the Bible says. It's for other reasons. Usually, it's feeling a spiritual vacuum," Rabbi Skobac said.

It's the same reason some Jews explore Buddhism. The problem is "they don't know much about Judaism; they had a shallow religious experience. They have a hole in the soul."

They feel Christianity provides a spiritual outlet and "once they embrace Christianity, they get interested in the Bible."

"Jews for Judaism exposes them to Jews who take God seriously, who pray to God every day and not necessarily from a prayer book.

"We get them to know who we are as people of faith and let them see there is something outside of the church.

"They're afraid. They're on a lifeboat and (they fear) if they step off, there's nothing there. We show Judaism's spiritual side. We spread the word that Judaism has this stuff... that Jewish teachings affect the core of our lives."

Turkey develops ties with Iraqi Kurds

Last week's column ended on a note about how, in a rapidly changing Middle East undergoing strategic realignment, Turkey has been moving away from Iran and the Iranian-backed Syrian regime. Moreover, Turkey shares some strategic interests with Israel.

There is another major piece of this picture. Turkey has also soured on the Iranian-influenced central government in Iraq headed by Shia leader Nuri al-Maliki, and is instead developing strong ties with the Kurdish Regional Government (KRG) in Erbil in northern Iraq. Ankara is increasingly relying on oil and gas from this autonomous Kurdish region, much to the consternation of Baghdad.

Mideast analyst Jonathan Spyer addressed this issue in the Dec. 27 Jerusalem Post: "Ankara, which once viewed the development of a Kurdish autonomy in northern Iraq with extreme suspicion, now appears to see Erbil as a possible ally against Baghdad and Tehran."

This move is ironic given that Turkey has a fractious relationship with its own sizable Kurdish minority numbering almost 20 million in the eastern part of the country. While Iraqi Kurds are semi-independent and may yet strive for complete autonomy from Baghdad, Turkey's Kurds are still struggling for independence even after having renounced their desire for sovereignty. Since coming to power in 2003, Turkey's Prime Minister Recep Erdogan made some improvements in the lives of the Kurds (30,000 to 40,000 of whom were killed in clashes with previous Turkish governments, especially in the 1990s). However, in the past couple of years there have been setbacks and Erdogan recently clamped down harshly on Kurdish militants of the outlawed PKK, based mainly in northern Iraq. Clashes last year between the Turkish army and Kurdish insurgents left more than 700 dead, including a number of Kurdish civilians.

So what might be the implications of Ankara's budding relations with the KRG for Turkey's own historically oppressed Kurds?

In Iraq, Kurds, Turks and Oil: A Tortuous Triangle, the Economist (Dec. 22) explained that Erdogan's government is trying to capitalize on divisions among the Kurds: "Turkey's government is using its commercial clout to press the Iraqi Kurds' president, Masoud Barzani, to help restrain militant Kurds within Turkey."

That commercial clout is significant. "A wide-ranging energy deal is in the works that will see state-backed Turkish firms and western oil majors plough money into Kurdish infrastructure and oilfields, connecting them to Turkey and the world beyond. The deal could eventually allow for up to 2M [barrels per day] of Kurdish oil exports to go through Turkey. [In 2011] trade between Turkey and Iraqi Kurdistan amounted to $8 billion," the Economist reported.

The term "Kurdistan" conveys its own irony since the Kurds – now more than 35 million strong in Iraq (six million), Iran (10 million), Syria (1.6 million) and Turkey – had been promised a state of their own, Kurdistan, in the aftermath of World War I. It was not to be. They have largely been ignored. No clamour has been raised internationally for their statehood.

Ofra Bengio, head of the Kurdish Studies Program at Tel Aviv University's Dayan Center, noted last month in Ha'aretz that "the Kurds in general are an ancient nation who have lived in their homeland from time immemorial. They have a unique language, culture and identity, all of which differentiate them from their [Arab] neighbours in the various lands where they live." According to Bengio, historically, they have a claim to self-determination at least as strong, if not stronger than that of the Palestinians. But, unfortunately, they lack advocates and proponents.

Many years ago, the New Republic remarked sardonically that the real plight of the Kurds was not to have had the Jews as their enemy, for otherwise the world would certainly have taken up their cause.

As the face of the post-Arab Spring Middle East continues to change, it will be interesting to keep an eye on important developments involving the Kurds – especially in Turkey – given the model they see in neighbouring Iraq. "Kurdistan" may finally become a more familiar term in the news this year.

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Palestinian indifference to Palestinian suffering

Like a string of three shining pearls held up against the sun, three discrete reports last week from Palestinian sources cast new revelations, if not actual new light, on the way their leaders treat their own people and truth.

• Each for different reasons, Hamas and the Palestinian Authority (PA) have spurned requests from the United Nations to take in some of the Palestinians fleeing for their lives from Syria.

Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas leader of Gaza, justified his refusal on ideology: he wants his suffering brethren to resettle in Israel. The PA explained its shrug of the indifferent shoulder on the basis of funds: it cannot afford to receive them.

• Yasser Arafat's widow, Suha, told Dubai TV that her husband had indeed planned the second intifadah all along. The Palestine Liberation Organization leader would not agree to the pleas and entreaties of U.S. president Bill Clinton and Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak to finally, peacefully, end the conflict. As Suha disclosed, her much venerated husband viewed negotiation and compromise as "betray[ing] the Palestinian cause."

• The Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics published figures stating that by the year 2020, there will be more Arabs than Jews in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza. The Palestinian figures may or may not be accurate. But they are the proverbial red herring: the only figures that count are the number of Jews in the State of Israel.

Israel has already separated from Gaza. The majority of Israelis wish to separate from the West Bank, too. They know it is the moral and pragmatically correct solution for truly ensuring the safety, security and Jewish majority of the Jewish state. But they seek a means of doing so that very distinctly does not follow the Gaza withdrawal precedent. That means separation, that is, a two-state solution, must be negotiated. However, the PA refuses to negotiate.

Over the past four years, the PA has demanded the right to dictate the terms under which negotiations must begin. And it has cleverly manipulated world opinion into providing diplomatic cover for its own refusal to sit at the table with Israel.

Thus it is especially disingenuous and exceptionally cloying to read former PA official Hanan Ashrawi say: "If the situation [the demographic trends according to the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics] carries on this way, at the end we'll be a majority, but we're giving the Israelis a chance to understand the Palestinians could have their own democratic country that would neighbour Israel." Her statement is entirely hollow. It is aimed at a fawning foreign media and diplomatic corps. It is her very own PA of Mahmoud Abbas (and Arafat before him) that has refused from the first to give birth through peaceful means of a democratic country. Indeed it even refuses today to provide safe harbour for the wretched Palestinians trying to flee Syria.

Positive feelings about rabbi not reported

You have done a great disservice to my shul, my congregation and my rabbi, Steven Schonblum. The article "Rabbi's contract not renewed at Beth Radom," (Jan. 3), makes negative assertions against Rabbi Schonblum in a manner that led me to believe it continued an effort to hurt the rabbi and his future. I express my dismay in the strongest possible terms.

The story should have made a greater effort to broaden its background information about the rabbi. It did not properly investigate. It did not report the strong positive feelings that many within the congregation have for Rabbi Schonblum. The closing comment about the rabbi not answering requests for his response was insufficient. He may not, at this time, have been able to comment or respond.

Peoples' views may differ, but to fail to give respect and honour to a man who has done his job and more than his job for the vast majority of the congregants is wrong. Rabbi Schonblum does not deserve this treatment. He has stood by me and my family in bad and good times. He has made my family's shul experiences very personal events that have stayed with each of us. He has acted and done everything I expected and would expect my rabbi to do.

Long ago, Rabbi Harold Lerner, of the Pride of Israel, said to my wife and I, "It is your job as parents to bring your children to shul, but it is my job as rabbi to keep them here." This is what Rabbi Schonblum has done for me and my family, and for many others. He has shared his goodness, his caring and his support for each and every person with whom he has come into contact.

Congregants value rabbi's counsel

I was surprised and saddened by the biased article "Rabbi's contract not renewed at Beth Radom," (Jan. 3) about Rabbi Steven Schonblum. He is the reason we joined Beth Radom Congregation. He has been the spiritual leader of our family for 14 years, beginning from before he became spiritual leader of the shul. He has always been available for us, in difficult times and happy times. Your article should have enlisted the large number of members who value his counsel and are disgusted with the present board, in its vendetta against him.

Con man on subway

Further to the letter titled "Con man on Toronto subway," (Jan. 3), I had a very similar experience, but was fortunate not to have ultimately given the man money. I did contact the police and subway authorities. I also posted a warning on a local email list that goes out to many Orthodox women in the city. I was amazed/alarmed at the response. Many women wrote back saying that a similar story happened to them/their friend or loved one. In each case, the con artist targeted his Jewish audience well. I hope more exposure like this will discourage this opportunistic thief.

Antisemitism on the ice

It was great to read about Andrew Goldberg's exciting hockey career ("Mississauga power forward works hard in draft year," Dec. 20). I wish him all the luck in the world. However, I am disturbed by the statement, "He occasionally hears on-ice taunting about being Jewish, but he thinks the other players are only 'trying to get me off my game. In hockey, it's chirping.'" My suggestion is that whether the comments or chirps are about Jews, or Muslims, or blacks, or gays or the disabled, and whether they take place on Twitter, in the classroom, in the workplace or on the ice, that they are in fact a form of racism and bigotry, and in Goldberg's case, antisemitism. He should let his opponents know that.

A primer on the Israeli elections

David H. Goldberg

The landscape in Israel is shifting as the political parties scramble for their share of the 120 seats in the 19th Knesset. Here is a thumbnail sketch of developments, by party bloc.

Centre-Right Bloc

The merged Likud-Beiteinu's campaign banners proclaim: "A strong prime minister, a strong Israel" and "When Netanyahu talks, people listen." Benjamin Netanyahu is portrayed as the only Israeli leader with the backbone and international experience to face down Iran's nuclear mullahs and approve controversial construction for Jerusalem and the settlements. The party is projected to win between 33 and 35 Knesset seats, down from its current 42.

Some Likudniks have expressed concern about the steady bleeding of support to the national religious Habayit Hayehudi. But such losses are said to be tolerable for Netanyahu as long as Likud-Beiteinu remains dominant and the overall Knesset configuration is skewed in favour of the party's "natural" coalition partners, the nationalist bloc and the haredim.

But it is in Netanyahu's strategic interest to leave open the possibility of a "secular" coalition devoid of those parties and involving alternate partners from the centrist bloc. It is uncertain how Avigdor Lieberman's legal difficulties might affect Likud-Beiteinu's electoral fortunes.

A relative neophyte politically, Naftali Bennett has successfully re-energized the Habayit Hayehudi (Jewish Home)-New National Religious Party. The party, running on a joint slate with Ichud Leumi (National Union) is forecast to take up to 15 seats. It is stridently opposed to Palestinian statehood and demands that Netanyahu unconditionally retract acceptance of the two-state formula in his 2009 Bar-Ilan University speech.

It promotes Jewish settlement in all of Greater Israel and proposes annexing parts of the West Bank currently fully controlled by Israel – Area C – and offering Israeli citizenship to the small number of Palestinians remaining there. It criticized the Gaza ceasefire, arguing that Netanyahu should have ordered the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) into Gaza to "topple Hamas" and end weapons smuggling.

Pundits attribute Habayit Hayehudi's popularity to Bennett's charisma and use of social media to extend the party's reach to audiences beyond the datiim (national religious sector), including "traditional" (i.e., non-Orthodox) Jews, women and western olim. The party is picking up the support of disenchanted nationalist Likud voters. It is also the beneficiary of a strong anti-Likud backlash among Israel's settlement and pro-settlement constituencies that are punishing Netanyahu for a litany of purported sins.

Bennett became embroiled in controversy after expressing his personal objection to an "immoral" IDF order to evacuate settlements. Likud launched attack ads exploiting Bennett's misstep, but the attacks were too personal. It is speculated that its decidedly hawkish views might limit Habayit Hayehudi's opportunities in coalition formation. But Bennett and the re-energized national religious community are undeniably political forces to be reckoned with.

Avarice and arrogance prevented this bloc's leaders from presenting Israeli voters with a credible ideological alternative to Netanyahu. Their one hope is to cobble a "blocking majority" of 61 seats that would compel President Shimon Peres to invite another member of the next Knesset – other than Netanyahu – to try to form a coalition.

The Labor party regained its mojo under leader Shelly Yachimovich and by building on the widespread socio-economic discontent expressed in Israel's 2011 "tent city" protests. Campaigning on the slogan, "Bibi is good for the rich, Shelly is good for you," Labor's economic plan promises improvements in the daily lives of Israel's middle class and "have-nots" at the expense of the wealthy.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Naftali Bennett

Shelly Yachimovich

In a major policy departure, Labor's security-diplomatic platform pledges continued funding for settlements. In explaining this policy shift, Yachimovich emphasized that Labor "is not a leftist party and never was. It was a centrist party" that had among its ranks security hawks as well as doves, hawks like Yitzhak Rabin who approached peacemaking pragmatically rather than as a romantic ideal. Labor is expected to win 17 to18 Knesset seats, picking up former Kadima supporters as well as disenchanted liberal Likud voters. Yachimovich has not ruled out joining a Netanyahu-led coalition – the question is what type of leverage she might garner from Labor's anticipated status as the next Knesset's second-largest party.

Former foreign minister Tzipi Livni controversially constructed the electoral slate for her new Hatnua (The Movement) party by poaching MKs from other parties, decimating her former Kadima party in the process. Discussions with other parties toward forming a centrist "super-party" foundered over the leadership question: Livni's reported offer of a rotating premiership was rejected by Yachimovich. Livni's goal from Day 1 was to portray herself as the only electoral alternative to Netanyahu and "his government's dangerous policies." Her campaign focuses on the Palestinian issue. Livni accuses Netanyahu of having "buried" the two-state formula. She intends to revive it, she says, because it is only through a viable Palestinian agreement that Israel can secure its international status as a Jewish and democratic state.

Livni acknowledges Israel's socio-economic challenges, but says that "social justice can only be reached alongside a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict." Livni endorses the strong Israeli national consensus concerning Jerusalem and the retention of settlement blocs in any final agreement. But, while supporting continued funding for most settlements, Livni demands an end to funding for political settlements from which, she claims, the overwhelming Israeli majority long ago divorced itself. Hatnua is expected to take 10 Knesset seats.

Controversy surrounds Livni's post-election status. Some pundits have her appointed a cabinet official responsible for Palestinian negotiations, others see Livni again withdrawing from politics rather than sitting in obscurity among the Knesset's opposition.

In introducing his new party, Yesh Atid (There Is A Future), Yair Lapid sought to portray himself as the "voice of Israel's centre," as a moderate on domestic political issues and a pragmatic hard-liner on security issues. His core campaign issue has focused on "equalizing the share of the burden," by demanding legislation compelling wholesale haredi military enlistment and entry into the workforce. Lapid protested the Netanyahu Government's exemption of 1,300 haredi men from military service in early December, charging that Netanyahu was pandering to his haredi coalition partners, Shas and United Torah Judaism (UTJ). Lapid also mocked Netanyahu's famous UN speech by presenting a diagram comparing the status of Israel's middle class to the Iranian nuclear threat, declaring that "raising taxes is our red line." Yesh Atid is polling around nine or 10 seats. Lapid is rumoured to be among those centrist politicians favoured by Netanyahu for a cabinet portfolio.

The Kadima party is in free-fall. The largest party in the outgoing Knesset, with 28 seats, now sits on the cusp of failing to acquire the two per cent of the popular vote required to claim a Knesset mandate.

Haredi Bloc

The Sephardi haredi Shas party's campaign focuses on two essential goals: maintaining the status quo affecting military deferments for haredi students, and protecting financial subsidies for large families. The odd leadership triumvirate imposed by spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef failed to maintain party unity. Incumbent leader Eli Yishai bristled at attempts by arch-rival Aryeh Deri, returning after a long exile due to criminal conviction, to reassert heretofore absolute control over the party. Externally, Shas has had to guard against voter support drifting to Am Shalem (Whole Nation), a new splinter faction founded by a former Shas MK who was exiled for questioning the party's commitment to defending the honour of Israel's downtrodden Sephardi community. Major controversy surrounded Benjamin Netanyahu's threat to wrest control of the Interior and Housing and Construction ministries "out of sectoral hands," in other words, from Shas. Deri charged that this threat was tantamount to ethnic discrimination against Israel's Sephardim and Mizrachim (those who come from eastern Mediterranean and Arab communities). The merger with Yisrael Beiteinu, Deri charged, had transformed Likud from "the party of the people" including many Sephardim, into "the party of arrogance that represents Russians and whites."

Some speculated that Deri's playing of the "ethnic card" reflected Shas' desperation at the prospect of being excluded from positions of influence in the next coalition. Others viewed Deri's outburst as a calculated move to secure for Shas the support of Sephardim who had been committed to Likud since Menachem Begin's days but who are now feeling estranged from the party. Shas should win about 11 Knesset seats. Its Ashkenazi haredi counterpart, United Torah Judaism should take 4 or 5 mandates.

The Arab Bloc

Israel's Arab leaders have consistently ignored their constituency's demand for one unified political party to represent their interests in the Knesset. Recent research indicates a disconnect between Arab voters' concerns with traditional local issues – education, poverty, unemployment, crime and violence – and the focus of Arab MKs on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and international BDS (boycott, divestment and sanctions) campaign. The core Arab parties are likely to retain their usual share of Knesset seats: Hadash (4), Ra'am-Ta'al (4), Balad-National Democratic Assembly (2). The disqualification from the election of Balad's Hanin Zoabi, due to her participation in the 2010 Mavi Marmara incident, was overturned on appeal to Israel's Supreme Court. Nevertheless, the Arab electorate's disappointment with and disconnect from the Arab MKs, combined with the failure of Israel's Jewish parties to establish meaningful connections with the Arab sector, will likely exacerbate a trend toward low voter participation among Israeli Arabs, with implications for Israeli democracy.

Women are still scapegoats

As Vancouver's winter gloom deepens, we have been immersed in the Middle Ages though a series of lectures on DVD offered by The Great Courses. We have reached the 14th and 15th centuries.

Medieval Europe conjures up pictures of ladies in distress, the court of King Arthur and Robin Hood, as well as the Magna Carta, for the lawyers in the crowd, and the rise of feudalism, for the social historians. More ominously, the period conjures up the Hundred Years War and the Black Death.

We have just reached the lecture on witchcraft. Witch-hunting, leading to the era of witch-burning, began in earnest in the 14th century, when the suffering population of Christian Europe was ripe for any seemingly reasonable solution to the Great Mortality (as it was known) that killed up to half the population of Europe.

How did this explosion of persecution come about? Current theories focus on the Inquisition (not a surprise). The Inquisition began by targeting suspected heretics who challenged Catholic Church doctrines. As the Inquisition progressed in viciousness, it began to conflate magicians, who had been viewed as misguided but harmless unless they practised harmful magic, with heretics. As a result, witchcraft also came to be regarded as satanic worship.

Most witches were old or isolated women who were unable to take shelter with a family or shunned by the community. But, of course, the Jews were persecuted, too.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

The 14th century was a fertile time for hunting witches, as whole villages were dying in a few days and there was no reasonable explanation for the terrible curse being visited on them. Once let out of the box, fear and loathing of witches gathered steam well into the 17th century before simmering down and being replaced by more modern hatreds.

Why am I telling you this?

Well, once again the issue of women is the forefront of my mind: specifically women and the Kotel, the Western Wall. Once again, uppity women have been arrested for – gasp – praying out loud at the Kotel, not to mention wearing tallit and even tfillin, refusing to be pushed aside or threatened by stones, chairs or whatever missile comes to hand. The guardians of the Kotel, now aided by the state, have made the area in front of the Wall their permanent little empire. Woe to those women who would tread on their domain. Or pray.

This was not supposed to happen. The Kotel – the remains of Herod the Butcher's retaining wall and not a part of the Temple at all – was to be a symbol of our return to Zion. It was to be a place for all Jews. All Jews. Those heady days after 1967, when we flocked to the plaza in front of the wall, weeping not with sorrow but with joy at once again having access to the place, seem a distant memory. In fact they are a distant memory. The Kotel is now the privilege of a few, and many have been banished. Tourists in paper kippot may come to gawk, but prayer for women who seek an experience outside a narrow interpretation of Judaism is out of the question.

That the Kotel was never a synagogue is irrelevant to its self-appointed guardians.

To me, it seems that women once again are the scapegoats of a misogynistic few. We may not be burned as witches, but we can be thrown into jail. Whence this fear and loathing? How is it that our own spiritual needs go unrecognized, unless expressed behind a curtain of cloth, wood or stone?

We shudder at the repression of women in the Islamic world, as Islamic regimes continue to suppress and persecute women. What would a theocratic Israel look like? Would it be so different? Is this little war over the Kotel symptomatic of larger trends underway in Israel?

The effort to control every aspect of personal life is already entrenched in Israeli law, handing over matters of personal status to those who consider themselves arbiters of the inner life of women. Oddly, both the Zionist and anti-Zionist groups on the religious right agree on one thing: women must not be allowed to sully the ears of men with their seductive voices or appear without proper garments. Or else they cause the men to sin.

I understand the Middle Ages. It's the modern one that perplexes me.

A business model for universities?

Universities are in financial trouble, and that is probably an inane understatement.

In many cases, it costs too much to attend them and they are grossly in debt, way over their ability to adequately pay for the resources needed. This is true of most places of learning and especially true of most public institutions. It is even applicable to many private schools. Those who support Jewish education know well of this problem.

But the university issue recently was highlighted in Quebec as students took to the streets and successfully fought an attempt to raise tuition. The increased payment schedule was minor, but the strike was major and some believe it brought down the Liberal government in Quebec.

Funding for universities here has taken a major hit, and there is no reprieve in sight. Solutions are misplaced or ambiguous as everyone ducks the responsibility to fund education. There is a long history both general and particular. Education is not an entitlement, but a responsibility and few are being responsible.

Some have suggested that we should adopt a business model that would streamline our approach to the classroom and to budgetary conundrums. A business model suggests that if you offer a course but not many students register, you cancel that class. Stop producing a product that does not sell. Fire the teacher whose "sales" output is consistently low, and you clean up the budget of non-producing departments. A business model.

First, we must find a way to measure that. In fact, I would say we are not necessarily clear on what our product is or on what our end goals ought to be. How do we define an educated graduate? Should they know how to read, or to write an expository essay? Should they be able to get a job in their desired field? Do we help them get a job? What are our goals and do they vary depending on the sector of the university entered into? Should there be some standards for all university graduates?

But wait, maybe we can learn something from a more sophisticated approach to business studies and use a business model.

A business is concerned ultimately with its retail position, with its profit margin. Will people buy what I am selling? So if my product is an education, diversity is good and perhaps some small classes are necessary for some forms of learning. Seminars are quite productive, and we know productivity is a good word for businesses. Even in universities, teachers are rated on their productivity. But the system needs to be overhauled so that quantity is considered alongside quality.

Large classrooms work only in some forms of education. Memorizing and repeat-after-me styles of learning are forged in those environments. But the process of critical thinking and debate requires a different element. Small is sometimes very good for the product. Mixing things up in the university, both at the graduate and undergraduate level, is desirable. We need not be so predictable in our methods and structures. If creative learning is to be initiated, we must establish it.

Norma Baumel Joseph

Furthermore, no business model is built on the concept of the researcher/innovator being the seller/marketer. Yet the university model clearly expects the professor to do the research and be the teacher. In fact, the prof is expected to also do service; that means s/he is also expected to do the administrative work of a manager. The result of this confusion of roles is that the rewards go to the research part of the job. This is the recognition and mainstay of the job. It is the publish or perish phenomenon.

But it is, of course, a terrible error from our perspective of the product of an education. For our concern should be the education of the students, however defined. And many researchers are terrible teachers; they are not good sales personnel. Yet many departments hire candidates without ever seeing them in a classroom, without any concern for their pedagogic skills. Would you hire someone in your store if they had no experience and you never watched them with a customer?

Whose business model are we following? Is the "business model" of a university all messed up?

We can learn from business, just let's learn correctly.

Israel and Iran wage a covert war

Israel and Iran have been waging a murky covert war for years now. This shadowy war has been punctuated by a succession of attacks, counterattacks, assassinations, cyber warfare, drone overflights and material assistance to proxies.

As 2013 gets underway, one can expect more of the same.

Israel is motivated by a desire to cripple or destroy Iran's nuclear weapons program and to inflict blows on its allies in the Gaza Strip, Lebanon and Sudan.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Iran, an Islamic theocracy, is driven by two overriding objectives – to obliterate Israel and to extend its influence in the Middle East.

One facet of this war came into public view shortly after the end of last November's eight-day border war between Israel and Hamas, an Iranian client. On three major road junctions in the Gaza Strip, large billboards were erected extolling Iran for its assistance to the Palestinian cause. The message on the billboards, inscribed in Arabic, English, Farsi and Hebrew, read, "Thank you, Iran," in what was the first explicit acknowledgment of Iran's role in arming Hamas.

During the recent Gaza war, Hamas and Islamic Jihad fired Fajr-5 rockets toward Tel Aviv, setting off its first air-raid alert since it was hit by Iraqi Scuds in the 1991 Gulf War, and at nearby Rishon LeZion. These projectiles, with a range of 75 kilometres, were supplied by Iran, a fervent supporter of radical Palestinian factions.

Israel downed many of the Fajr-5 rockets fired by Hamas and Islamic Jihad. That Hamas had access to such weapons in the first place speaks volumes about Iran's unwavering commitment to Palestinian rejectionist factions.

It's debatable how the rockets reached Gaza, which has been subjected to an Israeli naval blockade since Hamas' seizure of the coastal enclave from the mainstream Fatah movement in 2007 in a violent coup.

They may have been smuggled through a network of tunnels from the Sinai Peninsula into Gaza. Alternatively, as the leader of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, Gen. Mohammed Ali Jafari, suggested, the Fajr-5 technology was transferred by Iran to Palestinian workshops in Gaza, which were targeted by Israeli Air Force during the recent fighting.

Iran was only too glad to advertise its contribution to the Palestinians. Ali Larijani, the speaker of Iran's parliament, said he was "honoured" that Iran had materially helped Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, called Gaza's prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, to offer congratulations for Hamas' "victory" over Israel. Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Khamenei, chided Muslims nations for not having rallied behind Gaza in its showdown with Israel.

For their part, Palestinian leaders expressed gratitude to Iran. Khaled Meshal, the head of Hamas' political bureau, thanked Iran for its military and financial support. Ziad Nakhleh, the deputy leader of Islamic Jihad, openly admitted that the rockets in his arsenal were of Iranian origin. Mahmoud Zahar, one of the founders of Hamas, predicted that Iran would increase its aid package to Gaza.

By all accounts, Iran smuggles arms to Gaza by way of a circuitous route.

Iranian ships from the port of Bandar Abbas drop them off in Sudan, which signed a military cooperation agreement with Iran in 2008. From there, they are shipped northward to the lawless Sinai Peninsula and through tunnels to Gaza.

Being acutely aware of Iran's clandestine activities, Israel has devoted considerable resources to staunch the flow of weapons to the Palestinians in Gaza.

In the past decade, Israeli naval commandos have intercepted several ships laden with Iranian weapons. In the most celebrated case, in January 2002, Israel seized the Karine-A – a freighter loaded with 50 tons of missiles, mortars, explosives, rifles and mines worth $400 million – in the Red Sea.

Three years ago, in what developed into an international incident in Dubai, Mossad agents killed Mohammed Mabhouh, a Hamas official who procured arms from Iran.

This past October, a munitions or rocket factory in Sudan's capital, Khartoum, was bombed by a flight of unidentified jets. Sudan, having accused Israel of being behind the attack, promised a painful response. Israel maintained an official silence, neither denying nor taking credit for the bombing.

If the Israeli Air Force carried out this stealth strike, 1,900 kilometres from a base in Israel, Iran was certainly put on notice that its nuclear facilities may not be immune from destruction.

But Israel's message was not only directed at Iran. Israel, having bombed several Palestinian arms convoys in Sudan in the past three years in which apparently hundreds of Palestinians were killed, made one important point by striking the Sudanese factory.

Israel proved yet again that Sudan – whose president is sought by the International Criminal Court for having committed atrocities in the Darfur region – is a source of instability in the Middle East by virtue of its status as a transit point of arms smuggling from Iran to Gaza.

Short of actually attacking Iran's nuclear facilities, which it has threatened to do, Israel has tried to sabotage its atomic program through kidnappings, assassinations and cyber warfare.

In 2007, the Mossad reportedly abducted Ali Reza Asgari, Iran's deputy defence minister, who has not been heard from since. In the past few years, most recently last January, five Iranian scientists connected with Iran's nuclear program have been killed. Israel has denied responsibility, but Iran has pointed an accusatory finger at Israel. After last January's assassination, Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Benny Gantz, was quoted as saying that Iran should expect more "unnatural" events to occur.

Gen. Benny Gantz

Over the last two years, Israel, in conjunction with the United States, has launched a cyber assault on Iran's nuclear program in an operation known as Olympic Games. Authorized by U.S. president George W. Bush in 2006, Olympic Games' computer viruses, notably Stuxnet, have temporarily disabled centrifuges that enrich uranium. Two months ago, Iran announced the establishment of a special command centre to counter industrial sabotage of this kind.

Apart from Iran's militarized nuclear program, Israel is most concerned about its missile capabilities, since Iranian missiles can supposedly reach Israel.

Toward the close of 2011, a key figure in Iran's missile program, Hassan Moghaddam, was killed when a massive explosion levelled an ammunition depot near Tehran. Israel was immediately accused as the chief suspect.

Iran has struck back with a vengeance.

Iran and its Lebanese surrogate, Hezbollah, have been accused of masterminding attacks against Israeli embassies and embassy personnel, as well as Israeli tourists, in Bulgaria, India, Georgia, Kenya, Thailand, Argentina and Azerbaijan (which has dismissed reports that any preemptive strike on Iran would be launched from bases in Azerbaijan).

Iran, too, has boasted that Iranian-manufactured surveillance drones have made dozens of flights into Israeli airspace to collect reconnaissance data and probe Israel's air defences. These flights have originated in Lebanon and have been under the control of Hezbollah, the recipient of Iranian largesse.

It seems likely that Israel's covert war with Iran will escalate as Tehran moves inexorably closer toward building a nuclear device and thereby engulfing the Middle East in further tension.

Israel advocacy group joins Canadian campuses

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Anti-Israel sentiment on campus is growing and creating a hostile environment, and more resources are needed for pro-Israel students to combat these claims, Stand With Us CEO Roz Rothstein says.

The Los Angeles-based Israel education organization is expanding to Canadian campuses this year in hopes of helping to fight what Rothstein described in a phone interview when she was in Toronto recently as an increasingly serious situation on campuses.

"[Stand With Us] will work with other organizations and bring them all together with just one objective: to give a message to change the narrative and the lies about Israel," said Meryle Kates, executive director of Stand With Us Canada.

The American organization, which has offices in the United States, the United Kingdom, Israel and France, recently opened its first Canadian location in Toronto, bringing the total number of chapters to 17.

Rothstein said campuses in Canada are halfway between the United States and the United Kingdom in terms of the success of their anti-Israel campaigns. In the U.K., she said, Jewish students might be afraid to wear a Jewish star as a necklace. In the United States, anti-Israel ideas haven't taken hold nearly as much.

"They try to use the system and free speech... to destroy Israel's image," Rothstein said, adding that anti-Israel Americans are pushing to be more effective, but their efforts aren't working quite as well as in Canada.

Several student unions on Canadian campuses have adopted anti-Israel stances – most recently at the University of Toronto and York University.

These endorsements are "meaningless on the campus," Rothstein said. "It's not going to do anything, but what it does is bring a very negative, hostile dialogue to the campus."

Hillel has protested that some of these resolutions have passed because anti-Israel organizations or individuals add them to agendas about three days before a council meeting, giving pro-Israel students no time to respond.

This isn't always the case, however. For example, York University's graduate students' association representatives told The CJN the item was placed on the agenda at least a week before the meeting, though Kates said Hillel disputes that assertion.

Regardless, Rothstein said last-minute additions are often used, and Stand With Us knows to expect this and will try to prepare students to be ready when it happens. "It could come as no surprise," she said.

Anti-Israel students paint Israel as the biggest human rights abuser on the planet, Rothstein said, forcing a conversation onto campus that puts pro-Israel students on the defensive.

To respond to campus Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) endorsements, Rothstein said Stand With Us will work with existing organizations, supporting them in whatever they decide to do.

York's graduate students' union president Carolyn Hibbs told The CJN motions that aim to reconsider passed resolutions require a supermajority – in this case, a two-thirds majority – in order to pass.

The main goals of the Toronto office are to give students a liaison to discuss campus issues, and a place to get funding, speakers, materials and guidance, Rothstein said, "so that they can be involved and become leaders on campus."

The organization plans to distribute materials to fight Israeli Apartheid Week, the annual series of lectures and events on university campuses across Canada that focuses primarily on promoting the BDS campaign. Rothstein said these events on Canadian campuses are often darker and more aggressive than on American campuses.

"We're going to be shipping a huge display that talks about Israel's size and diversity," Rothstein said, adding that it will also have information about Hamas and its charter. She said Stand With Us is important because it is entirely focused on teaching about Israel.

"Everybody else's mission statement has maybe a little bit of teaching Israel," Rothstein said, "but that's all we do."

She said the organization is the largest producer of material about Israel, which it hopes will help pro-Israel students fight for the hearts of other students on campus.

"What I've realized being here is you have a lot of caring and passionate people and organizations," she said, but she's concerned that too many students only here the anti-Israel side of the story.

"I think Stand With Us will be a nice addition to the tapestry to help combat the issues we're seeing here," she said.

Nikki shines in all-star Streisand tribute DVD

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Barbra Streisand fans who remember her October concerts in Montreal and across Canada will enjoy watching 13 artists singing her most beloved songs in A Music Cares Tribute to Barbra Streisand recently released by Shout Factory in both Blu-ray and DVD formats.

The 70-year-old Streisand, considered by many music critics the greatest singer of all time, was saluted in February 2011 by Music Cares in Los Angeles for her contributions to music. Highlights from the evening are in the one-hour recording.

The DVD showcases an illustrious roster of performers, including Canadians Faith Hill and Diana Krall, along with Tony Bennett, Barry Manilow and Stevie Wonder covering Streisand hit songs, such as Send in The Clowns (Hill), Down With Love (Krall), Smile (Bennett), Memory (Manilow) and People (Wonder).

Standing out was the youngest of the performers, then-17-year-old Nikki Yanofsky of Montreal, with her interpetation of a medley of Lazy Afternoon/On a Clear Day You Can See Forever, accompanied by jazz pianist Herbie Hancock.

Nikki Yanofsky

Yanofsky began the medley as a ballad (as Streisand performed the songs) with long, drawn-out notes, and midway, she made the tempo more jazzy and upbeat, snapping her fingers. She ended her four-minute performance by belting out the final note to a standing ovation from the audience, including Streisand.

"To perform for Barbra Streisand, well, that's a dream come true," Yanofsky said in a phone interview. "My mother and I saw all her films from Funny Girl to Yentl, and to share the stage in her honour with Herbie Hancock, Barry Manilow and Stevie Wonder was a special moment for me. There is no singer alive than can be as perfect as Barbra Streisand."

Yanofsky more than held her own with the other singers and insisted she was never nervous about her performance.

"I rehearsed often and was ready, so there was nothing to be nervous about. I was very pleased with the result and will never forget that night."

Yanofsky, who hopes to have a long, illustrious career in music as Streisand has, may look back at her performance as a memorable milestone, much as Streisand did when she first performed on Judy Garland's television show in 1963.

After seeing her in concert, Tony Bennett paid Yanofsky a compliment, calling her "the best singer to come along since Judy Garland."

Yanofsky is well-known in Canada and is hoping to achieve similar recognition in the United States. In the past two months, she toured in Los Angeles, sang in an all-star tribute to songwriter Carole King, and will be performing in Las Vegas in February.

"Nikki is already more established and mature than most singers her age. She will inevitably be compared to the greatest of singers before long," said jazz music promoter Larry Rosen, who booked Yanofsky in Las Vegas.

Other notable performances on the DVD include Lea Michele's interpretation of My Man and the duet of Kristen Chenowith and Matthew Morrison singing One Last Bell To Answer/A House Is Not A Home.

Streisand herself performs two songs: Windmills of Your Mind and I'll Never Say Goodbye.

The only quibble about the DVD is that it was heavily edited, and some popular Streisand songs that she performed at the event, including Evergreen, Happy Days Are Here Again and The Way We Were were omitted.

However, hearing the memorable performance by Yanofsky and the unique interpretations of Streisand songs by Manilow and Wonder, in particular, make the DVD a treasure.

Making People's Lives BETTER

Finding the time and the will

Working together for a better world

We are all busy and are forced to prioritize between competing important matters.

We cannot do everything, so we are forced to choose. High on the agenda for any Canadian must be the concern for Canada. We dare not take our great country for granted. There are challenges ahead in so many areas.

High among these challenges, perhaps even highest because of its importance, is the matter of co-operation between the variety of religions and ethnicities that Canada has embraced. Within that grouping, the most potentially explosive is the relationship between the Muslim community and the Jewish community. This is so because of the unfortunate, and I would add inexcusable, enmity that has been generated against the Jews on an international scale. Jews have not called for the annihilation of any other group. Jews have not advocated a holy war. Yet they hear this being advocated against them. How can they not be concerned and worried? Let's be clear. Jews make up a puny 15 million people, compared to about one billion Muslims. Jews are not a threat. But Jews are threatened. On campuses, in intellectual fora, even on the street, Jews live with an acute awareness of this tension that can explode at any moment.

In an ideal world, this type of tension would simply not exist. But we are not living in an ideal world. Here in Canada, there have been pockets of co-operation between the Jewish and Muslim communities, as my partner in this joint endeavour, Mohammed Azhar Ali Khan, shares in his piece. But to say that there is an abiding friendship between these communities would be a real stretch. Can such a friendship develop? Possibly. But it will not come without great effort. The challenge will be to buck the international trend, to even defy it and reject it. That will take courage and resolve.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

But mere talk remains cheap. It is via real, facts on the ground action, that the communities can develop real friendship. Dare we dream that if that develops, the friendship will be a powerful counterforce to the prevailing winds of hate. To create tranquil, harmonious facts on the ground will take time, together with the resolve. We are looking at an agenda of co-operation that will start with small things, with co-operative efforts. Years ago many religious communities banded together in Ottawa to actively promote blood donation.

The need for blood remains a pressing matter, as does the need for our communities to come together. Working in tandem to actively promote blood donation will help both urgent issues. Beyond joint statements, I am talking of having a jointly sponsored blood drive bringing together the Muslim and Jewish communities in every major city in Canada.

On one day across Canada, the Muslim community and the Jewish community would sponsor an endeavour (blood donation) that will bring all Canadians together to save Canadian lives, to give life to Canada, and to bring energy and vigour to an effort that is so vital – bringing our communities together. We would be fooling ourselves if we said that there is no hate in Canada. We would be equally irresponsible if we did nothing to counter it. And we would be unwise if all we did was issue statements condemning hate, bigotry, antisemitism, Islamophobia, and any other phobia. The way to counter hate is with overt acts of friendship, kindness, co-operation, compassion – blood drives, co-operative fundraising for worthy charities, joint communal celebrations on Canada Day and Thanksgiving Day, school exchanges, etc.

We can all agree these are worthwhile ideas. But they can only work if there are champions among us ready to dive in, at every level, in every community, to make this happen. It will take the full co-operation of the organized Muslim and Jewish communities to make this work. It obviously starts with discussion, with a meeting of the minds and hearts, and branches out from there.

Every day lost in trying to push this issue forward is a day of lost opportunity, a day in which things could have, and should have been better. The joint sharing of ideas in this forum, with Mohammed Azhar Ali Khan, a true gentleman, reflects the many conversations we have had on this pressing issue. Our hope is that this public sharing will help bring our communities together, on a national scale, in a spirit of understanding and co-operation that will help ensure Canada's greatness for generations to come. If we have the will, and make the time, it will happen.

Otherwise, well, there is no otherwise.

Rabbi Bulka is rabbi of Congregation Machzikei Hadas and chair of Trillium Gift of Life Network responsible for organ and tissue donation and transplantation in Ontario. Among his many honours, he was awarded the "Key to the City" of Ottawa for his community endeavours.

Let's make Canada a model of peace

Working together for a better world

Rabbi Reuven Bulka and I agree that hate and cruelty violate the principles of Judaism, Christianity and Islam and those of Canada too.

The Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him) treated non-Muslims with justice and compassion. He made pacts with Jews and idol worshippers in Medina and respected his covenants.

Dr. Muqtedar Khan of the University of Delaware says Rabbi Mukhayriq of Tha'labadh tribe in Medina fought alongside Prophet Muhammad in the battle of Uhud and was martyred. Rabbi Mukhayriq also donated seven gardens with which the prophet formed the first waqf – a charitable endowment.

Imam Mohamad Jebara of the Cordova Academy in Ottawa states: "Jews were expelled from Jerusalem in the year 70 CE by the Romans, who destroyed the temple of Herod, commencing the Jewish Diaspora. When Rome adopted the Christian faith after 325 CE they maintained a strict ban on Jews coming near Jerusalem. This ban remained until the Christians of Jerusalem surrendered the city to the Muslim caliph Umar.

Muslims then permitted the Jews to come to Jerusalem for the first time in over 600 years, but only for pilgrimage as the Christians had stated in the surrender terms that they will only surrender the city to the Muslims on condition that the Jews not be permitted to live in the city. Later, during the Abbasid caliphate, Muslims allowed Jews to settle in the city again. Jews remained there till the city fell to the Crusaders in July 1099. Jews were again forbidden to enter Jerusalem till Salahuddin liberated the city and Muslims then allowed Jews free entry into Jerusalem with no restrictions.

Generally, Jews lived in peace under Arab, Ottoman and Muslim Spanish caliphs. When Spain expelled Jews in the 15th century, European countries were reluctant to accept them. The Ottoman Empire, however, welcomed them. During Hitler's time too, German Jews sought refuge in Turkey and among Muslims elsewhere.

Some Muslims assisted Jews during the Holocaust. Faith Matters, a British organization, identified such Muslims in a booklet, The Role of Righteous Muslim Persons. They were from many countries and were among those Jerusalem's Yad Vashem called Righteous Gentiles.

Sadly, Jews have also been persecuted in Muslim countries by unjust rulers who also persecuted others. Muslims suffered from their own unjust rulers and from colonial occupiers. Jews suffered greatly for centuries – antisemitism in the Soviet empire and in the West culminated in the Holocaust.

The Holy Quran also criticizes the action of some Jews. It criticizes Muslims too.

Says the Holy Quran: "O people, we have created you from a single (pair) of male and female, and made you into nations and tribes, so that you may know each other (not that you may despise each other). Verily, the most honoured of you in the sight of God is the one who is the most pious among you. God has full knowledge and is well-acquainted (with all things)." (4:13)

Mohammed Azhar Ali Khan

In the 1980s the Ottawa Muslim Association, which I led at that time, cooperated with Christian and Jewish organizations in a meeting on Parliament Hill to celebrate their shared heritage as descendents of the Prophet Abraham. This was the first time in Canada that Jewish, Christian and Muslim groups worked together. Now such co-operation is quite common.

Jewish Family Services in Ottawa also provides social services to Somalis, and has set up a mentoring program for them. This has existed for some time.

For several years mosques and synagogues are being twinned in Toronto and other cities in Canada and the United States, to expand better understanding.

Jews and Muslims differ on the Middle East. Canadian Muslims passionately believe in a just peace in the Middle East that treats Israelis and Palestinians as equals in every respect.

That said, Jews and Muslims must work together and with Canadians of other faiths to promote human rights, equality, justice and opportunity for all Canadians and make Canada a model of peace and justice in a troubled world.

Mohammed Azhar Ali Khan is a retired journalist, civil servant and refugee judge. He founded the Muslim Coordinating Council which seeks to uplift the Muslim community and work with Canadians of other faiths to promote human rights for all Canadians. He has received the Order of Canada, the Order of Ontario and the Queen's Diamond and Golden Jubilee medals for his work as a journalist,his leadership of Muslims and for promoting better understanding between Canadians of different faiths

Financial guide aids those considering aliyah

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — So you're thinking of making aliyah. But do you know what you are signing up for? A fair number of Jewish North Americans who take that leap of faith that is aliyah soon limp back home in frustration.

Brent (Baruch) Labinsky is confident that his new book, A Financial Guide to Aliyah and Life in Israel, will help make the transition for new olim smoother and greatly improve their odds of making a successful aliyah.

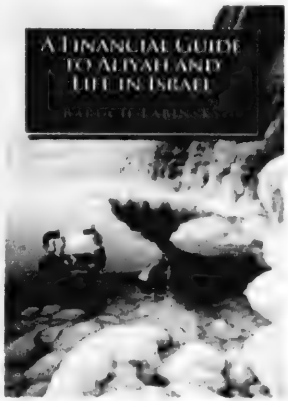
The former Winnipegger and his wife, the former Tammy Esser from Toronto, made aliyah in 1993, shortly after their marriage. Baruch – who is a financial planner by profession – and Tammy now live in Ramat Beth Shemesh, near Jerusalem, and have seven children.

"When we made aliyah," Labinsky recalls, "we learned by way of the school of hard knocks how difficult dealing with the bureaucracy here can be."

While there is information about the aliyah process in different places, there is no one co-ordinated source, Labinsky notes. That is what he hopes his book will remedy.

The 230-page book covers the gamut of issues, including having a financial plan, insurance issues, understanding the Israeli employment market, asset management in Israel, retirement and estate planning, the banking system, the tax system, renting or purchasing a home and living on an Israeli salary.

"The Israeli system may seem similar to what North Americans are used to," Labinsky says, "but it is in reality quite different. Taxes, for example, are structured differently. Most Israelis don't have to file tax returns. Taxes are automatically taken off their pay cheques. Only the self-employed are required to file returns.



"And the investment environment is very different," Labinsky says.

He notes that the Israeli standard of living is much closer to the North American standard than it used to be. Nevertheless, you have to be a lot more careful about how you spend your money, Labinsky cautions. Cars and homes are much more expensive. And you really have to save for larger expenditures such as simchahs or retirement.

Readers of the book may want to start at the back at "Frequently Asked Questions." Labinsky tackles questions such as where to go after you get off the plane (he recommends that you rent a place first until you have adjusted, built up a social network and decided where you want to live) and whether to take time to learn Hebrew in an ulpan or look for work immediately (he suggests doing both at the same time). He also answers questions about how and where to open a bank account, what benefits new olim are entitled to, how to manage your finances in Israel and what to bring with you to Israel and how much it may cost.

"The number of olim who are coming from North America has been growing in recent years thanks to programs such as Nefesh B'Nefesh," he says. "And there are tremendous opportunities. Virtually all North American olim find jobs within a year."

He adds that high-tech industry in Israel, in particular, is flourishing. "Modern-day Israel is an economic miracle," he says. "The stock market is outperforming other major stock markets around the world."

Labinsky is scheduled to be in Toronto Jan. 15 to 17, 2013, to talk about his book and the financial aspects of making aliyah.

The book is available online at his website, http://labinsky.com, and from amazon.com.

Conference examines plight of Roma

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL—The Kleinmann Family Foundation (KFF), which since 1995 has sponsored educational activities on the Holocaust and the dangers of prejudice, has turned its attention to the plight of the Roma.

With Concordia University, the KFF organized a day-long conference last month, open free of charge to the public, titled "History Speaks: Do We Listen? Porrajmos and the Resurgence of 'Anti-Gypsy' Extremism."

Porrajmos is a Romani word meaning devouring or destruction and refers to Nazi Germany's attempted extermination of the Roma, pejoratively known as "Gypsies."

At the event's launch, held at the Goethe-Institut Montréal, a German government-sponsored cultural centre, the New Democrats' Canadian heritage critic, Tyrone Benskin, took aim at the federal government's recent reform of the refugee system.

Passed in June, Bill C-31 has been criticized by the Jewish community, among others, as likely to make it more difficult for persecuted people, in particular the Roma in Europe, to find asylum in Canada.

"Sadly, our own government, with Bill C-31, is hurting the people it is supposed to be protecting. Canada should be a leader in stamping out racism in all its forms," said Benskin, a Montreal MP for the riding of Jeanne-Le Ber.

Benskin, who is black, believes the legislation is "targeting" the Roma "because they do not fit in the box of the majority... We can't close our eyes to those who are vulnerable."

Benskin, who was first elected to Parliament in 2011, noted that Jews, Roma and blacks share a history of having been persecuted and murdered by the Nazis and of having been "regarded with fear," which led to prejudice.

Executive director Naomi Kramer said this was the first time the KFF had sponsored an event related to the Roma.

"The reason is that it is relevant in Canada, as it is worldwide. The Roma are having difficulty getting into Canada, because most come from Hungary and, as it is part of the European Union, they cannot be considered as refugees. Yet they are experiencing discrimination and violence that is impossible to live with."

The launch included remarks by German Consul General Walter Leuchs, who said the Roma persecution under the Nazis should be better known, and Sebastian Knotz, a young man from Austria currently serving as a Gedenkdiener, or Holocaust memorial intern, at the KFF.

Founded in 1991, the volunteer program is an acknowledgement of Austria's role in the Nazi genocide.

The event also heard a moving tribute to the memory of Gabrielle Tyrnauer, a Jewish refugee from Nazism and a pioneering scholar of Roma history, by colleague and friend Yehudi Lindeman, a retired McGill University professor and, like Tyrnauer, a child survivor of the Holocaust.

During the 1980s and '90s, Tyrnauer (1932-2004), a native of Vienna, recorded the oral testimonies of many Roma survivors of Nazi persecution and published reports for the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, among others, on what was then a neglected subject.

On view was a digital exhibition of photos of modern-day Roma life in Romania taken by David Ward of Concordia a few years ago. Titled Marginal, with text by Salman Rushdie, the pictures depict the extreme poverty of a people living outside the mainstream, yet maintaining a strong family and cultural life.

The conference concluded with a screening of A People Uncounted the first feature-length documentary by Toronto-based filmmaker Aaron Yeger.

Filmed in 11 countries, it surveys the history and culture of the Roma, depicting them as a people both romanticized and vilified in popular culture.

Kramer said a second conference on the Roma is being planned for next year.

"The fate of Romani communities in many ways paralleled the fate of Jews during World War II," she said.

"With widespread support from the European population at large, which harboured social prejudice towards the Roma, they were singled out by the Nazis as 'racially inferior,' and sent to forced-labour and death camps," she said.

Historians estimate that about 500,000, or 25 per cent of European Roma, where annihilated, according to data cited by the KFF.

The KFF was founded by the late Peter Kleinmann, a Montreal businessman born in Munkacs, Hungary, who survived the Gross-Rosen, Flossenburg and Auschwitz camps. He frequently spoke to students about the Holocaust.

French Jewish dentists looking to relocate

Professionals seeking new home in Quebec

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Barry Dolman, the first Jewish president of the Quebec Order of Dentists, returned from France in November shaken by the anxiety expressed by Jewish dentists about their future in that country.

Dolman, who was elected head of the professional organization in November 2011, recently returned from Paris for meetings in connection with a historic agreement between Quebec and France that allows greater mobility of professionals, including dentists, between the two jurisdictions, notably through mutual recognition of qualifications.

"While in France, I had the occasion to speak to a number of Jewish dentists actively looking to relocate to Quebec because of the ever-increasing religious intolerance in that country," Dolman told The CJN.

"As the president of the licensing authority, I was able to answer their questions relating to the legal process, but was shocked by their personal inquiries.

"Normal questions about finding access to synagogues, Jewish education and kosher food were followed by 'Are there areas in Montreal where Jewish residents are well tolerated or accepted?'

"I must say my jaw dropped, and in that one inquiry, the entire dilemma of these colleagues became clear."

Barry Dolman

These Jewish dentists have good livelihoods and live comfortably in the material sense, but they are very uneasy. Many felt there's no future for their children in France, Dolman said.

Dolman, who has been practising dentistry for 37 years, was elected in a general vote open to the order's more than 4,700 members throughout the province to a four-year term.

"This is not the first breakthrough I have made as a Jewish dentist within my profession," he said. "But it's probably the most significant given this current political context."

He added: "Early on in my career, unlike some of my colleagues and friends who left when the Parti Québécois was originally elected [in 1976], I made a decision to remain in Montreal with my young family. It was certainly news at the time and made the front page of The Globe and Mail."

Dolman said the fact he graduated from both McGill University (B.Sc., 1971) and the Université de Montréal (DDM, 1975) has enabled him to embrace the city's cultural duality.

Dolman decided in 2010 to challenge the sitting president of the order, Diane Legault, a former Liberal member of the National Assembly and the first woman to become its president when she was elected in 2006.

"My colleagues said it was more than a long shot, as there had never been a Jewish president," he recalled.

"I was elected across the province from Abitibi to Quebec City with a two-thirds majority in every constituency except in Gaspé, where I lost by one vote," said Dolman.

He believes this is a positive statement from a society that is so often divided over language.

He is also the current chair of the Canadian section of the Pierre Fauchard Academy, an international dental organization founded in 1936, and a past president of the Canadian Dental Association. He has been a member of the Alpha Omega International Dental Fraternity, an organization of Jewish dentists, since 1975.

After hearing the concerns of these French Jewish dentists first hand, Dolman said he returned to Quebec all the more appreciative.

"I realize that, although we often hear complaints about the language policy, we are very fortunate to live where we are, have what we have, and are respected for who and what we are and how we have contributed to the society in which we live."

The order's mission is to maintain high standards of dental practice and ethical conduct, and to promote oral health among Quebecers.

Arie's wife, Joy, says although he doesn't look sick, Arie is usually exceptionally tired, as the kidney is responsible for creating a hormone that triggers the body to create red blood cells. The disease can also cause nausea, skin conditions and trouble with digestion. The cysts on Arie's kidney sometimes rupture, leaving him in extreme pain and incapacitated for up to a week.

"I am a private person but this is why we have had to come forward," Arie said. "We are at a point where we need to share our story." He added the family has received support and offers of help from many colleagues, acquaintances and even strangers.

Doctors say they would like to do the transplant before Arie starts dialysis, as this could make for a better prognosis. But because he is not on dialysis, he is not on the deceased donors transplant waiting list. This is why he needs a living donor.

Ilana has been on dialysis for 19 years. She was diagnosed with PKD shortly after giving birth to Arie. She was not told it was genetic, nor that there was a 50 per cent chance her children would inherit the disease.

After having Joshua, she started seeing a nephrologist who told her she would be on dialysis by age 45. She started when she was 40.

Ilana, a Burlington, Ont., resident, goes for dialysis six days a week for three hours each time. Her shoulders and back ache. And the dialysis causes her to have brittle bones that sometimes fracture for no reason. It also makes her brain feel "cloudy."

"Dialysis prolongs life, but it's not a cure," Ilana said.

Arie's dad gave her a kidney 16 years ago, which her body rejected. Two years later, a second kidney from a deceased donor also failed. Both times, she became very ill due to a reaction to the anti-rejection drugs.

"I fought really hard for those kidneys. They nearly did me in," Ilana said, adding doctors are ready to try again.

This time, Ilana needs a living donor so the transplant can be scheduled and they can desensitize her body to the new organ by suppressing her immune system without her waiting on the list.

"A lot of people don't live as long as me on dialysis," Ilana said. "What can I say? I am not ready to throw in the towel yet. I have to see that my children are safe."

Organ donation: the ultimate mitzvah

The chairman of the board of Ontario's organ and tissue donation agency says educating the Jewish community about organ donation is a continual battle.

Donating an organ is not only acceptable – it is the ultimate mitzvah, said Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa, who is chairman of the Trillium Gift of Life Network.

"We have been hard-wired over thousands of years. It is not easy to take a mindset and recalculate it.

"But saving of a life is considered the premier fulfilment of the Jewish religion, whether that is donating money to the poor, lifting one's spirits or actually saving their bodily life."

Rabbi Bulka says that saving a life supersedes halachic restrictions such as the need for immediate burial after death.

As for the belief that we must be buried whole, Rabbi Bulka points out that a person who has had his colon removed due to cancer is not being buried in his entirety.

"If this idea is standing in the way of donating an organ, it doesn't make any sense," he said.

"Jews have been at the forefront of lifesaving since time immemorial. We have come up with the best medicines. Some of our greatest sages were doctors.

"We need our leaders to spring up. Our teachers and rabbis have to beat their drums on this and affirm that it's the highest mitzvah. It's not just acceptable, it's the highest mitzvah. If people ask, 'Is it something I must do?' The answer must be 'yes, yes, yes.' Then we will get action."

LISTEN TO US ON SUNDAY MORNINGS AT 11:30 AM ON 740

It's not enough to hear the message

Rabbi David Rosenthal

In my family, it's known that I make all the important, far-reaching decisions, and leave the small, trivial ones to my wife. I decide when Israel should bomb Iran, how to solve the Palestinian problem, how to alleviate the economic problems and how to solve world hunger. My wife merely decides where we're going to live, how to bring up our kids and what to spend our money on.

There's a passage in the Torah informing us of Jethro's – Moses' father-in-law – hearing about the Exodus and coming to the Jewish nation to convert. The Torah emphasizes that Jethro heard about the huge miracles that HaShem had done ("Vayishma"). The inference is that no one else heard about it. That's equivalent to saying President Harry S. Truman heard about the Hiroshima bombing, but no one else did. A little absurd, no? Events of such cataclysmic proportion are hard to keep under wraps. The whole world knew about the plagues and the splitting of the sea.

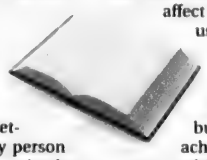
So, what is the Torah trying to tell us?

There are actually two meanings behind the word lishmoa (to hear, in Hebrew). First, it's the physical act of listening, i.e. the sound waves hitting your eardrum and being received by your brain. Second, it means understanding what's being said, internalizing the meaning behind the words.

The quintessential prayer for the Jew, Shema Yisrael, comes from the same word. It's not "Hear O Israel" as it's traditionally translated. Rather it's "Understand and internalize."

From the fact that Jethro was the only person to come to join the Jewish People, the Torah is letting us know that the only person who truly heard about the miracles was Jethro. Many were certainly told what happened. But the fact that none of them did anything about it shows that they really didn't understand the ramifications. They didn't hear the message.

Rabbinic Reflections



Now to bring this to a more practical level. Recent world events have left a lot of us shocked and numb – from Hurricane Sandy to the school massacre in Connecticut, there is so much pain and sadness in the world. The question we need to ask ourselves is: Were we changed in any tangible way? Did we take action? Did it cause any introspection or change? We are bombarded by news and information, yet they seems to have less and less effect on us.

Instead of sitting at the Shabbat table discussing solutions to problems not within our control, maybe we should aim our sights a little lower, a little more realistically and ask ourselves how these events can affect us personally, to help us change and grow. Changing ourselves is a little less dramatic than bombing nuclear reactors in Iran, but it's much harder to achieve because it means pushing ourselves, tangibly changing.

The intimation from Jethro is that we must hear the messages from world events. We must internalize and act upon the things we perceive, and not merely content ourselves with being the backseat driver in world politics.

Rabbi David Rosenthal is the director of outreach and development at the Thornhill Woods Shul and Jewish Centre for Learning and Living in Thornhill, Ont.

Lessons to be learned from hockey lockout

I lost my interest in professional hockey long ago. While it may be a function of "growing up," I imagine there is more too it than that. After all, my interest in baseball has waned little, and I still enjoy Olympic hockey – I guess that's not professional hockey.

The encouragement of violent play, the disregard for player safety coupled with the arrogance of so many (something that infects almost all professional sport), greed and more have turned off this former fan. Apparently my lack of interest is not so uncommon, even in Canada. What likely makes me a bit unique is my interest in the NHL "lockout." The lessons it teaches about human nature are numerous, more than I can address in this short article. But let's start with greed.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

"Whoever has a hundred wants two hundred," our sages teach. It boggles the mind how people in their 20s, most with bleak job prospects outside of hockey, are willing to sacrifice a year of a short career because, on average, they earn "only" $2.5 million a year – up close to 70 per cent since the last lockout. Wealth rarely brings happiness – much more often it brings envy and jealousy – those with millions are often upset they don't have hundreds of millions. How sad!

Even more startling is the number of players who, at a fraction of the salary they would earn in the NHL, are playing overseas. What possible logic could there be for this other than the human desire to defeat the other? Claims by players that they play for the love of the game are both patently false and absolutely true. Man truly will bite off his nose to spite his face.

Undoubtedly labour negotiators will argue that this is a most naive view and such extreme measures are necessary. That may be true if your goal is victory or at least saving face rather than what is in one's best interest. Concern for the impact on third parties – restaurant owners, ticket sellers, those who really do need the money – is considered a sign of weakness.

While some fans murmur about boycotting hockey outside of a few markets where hockey has never had deep roots, I will be shocked if any negative impact is felt in hockey hotbeds like Toronto. Our sages long understood that claims of what one might do in any given circumstance carry very little weight – what we say we will do and what we do are usually quite different. This is the basis behind the concept of Asmachta, a non-binding agreement, where statements such as, "if I don't do such and such, I will give you $1,000," are unenforceable as they do not generate reliance. All know that words alone are pretty meaningless.

The lockout has generated much anger and frustration highlighting the rabbinic dictum that the character of a person can be seen by "kiso, koso, ka'aso," his money, anger and drinking.

By the time this article is printed, the two sides may have dug in so deep that the season will be cancelled. Even if they reach some kind of agreement, I am looking forward to the sound of "Play Ball".

A book for the thoughtful, 'skeptical' Orthodox

Orthodox Jews commonly believe that "Torah from heaven" is the central tenet of the Jewish religion. But what precisely does that belief entail? A courageous new book by Rabbi Norman Solomon, Torah from Heaven: The Reconstruction of Faith, tries to answer that question. The book has an impressive range, from scholarship about biblical times to 21st-century theology and almost all periods in between.

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

Rabbi Solomon worked as an Orthodox congregational rabbi in England for 22 years before joining academia. He is now retired, but is still affiliated with Oxford University. He describes himself as part of the "skeptical" Orthodox, a group that he claims is larger than most people realize.

Usually "Torah from heaven" in Orthodox circles is understood to mean that God dictated the entire text of the first five books of the Bible (with the possible exception of the last eight verses of Deuteronomy) to Moses, who then wrote it down. Furthermore, the text of the Torah scroll that we have in our synagogues today is precisely what Moses wrote. Rabbi Solomon quotes Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, the leader of neo-Orthodox Judaism in the 19th century: "When we raise aloft this Torah… we jubilantly proclaim Vezot Hatorah ['This is the Torah which Moses set before the Israelites,' Deuteronomy 4:43]… that it is still the same Torah which Moses brought to Israel 'through the mouth of God through the hand of Moses,' the same Torah, pure and unadulterated."

But Rabbi Solomon notes that the Hebrew word "torah" in the Bible just means "teaching" or "instruction." Even Rashi (1040-1105), the greatest Jewish Bible commentator and surely unskeptically Orthodox, explained that the verse in Deuteronomy simply means that Moses' speech containing his teachings (torah) is about to begin – i.e. "This," what follows in the following chapters, "is the torah [teaching] which Moses set [i.e. spoke] before the Israelites." Only many centuries after Moses did people begin to use the word Torah to refer to the first five books of the Bible and did anyone write down the claim that Moses was the author of the so-called Five Books of Moses. (The word "torah" in the verse in Deuteronomy 31:9, "Moses wrote this torah," is not a reference to the Five Books of Moses but to the recording of a specific "teaching," or at most a set of teachings, as was recognized even by a number of traditionalist Bible commentators such as Rabbi Ovadya Seforno [c. 1475-1550].)

Rabbi Solomon argues further that historical scholarship makes it impossible to believe that Moses was the author of Genesis to Deuteronomy, or that our text of the Torah today is identical to the original one. The Talmud often quotes biblical verses whose wording or spelling differs from our own (as do Rashi and basically every other Bible commentator who lived before the days of the printing press).

Not satisfied with tackling this formidable set of problems, Rabbi Solomon goes on to note how rabbis in later centuries greatly expanded the range of the word "torah." By considering most (or all) of rabbinic teachings (and sometimes also works of Jewish mysticism) as Torah or Oral Torah, they made those teachings authoritative and inviolable. For example, because of this expanded definition of God's Torah, Rabbi Ben-Zion Uzziel (1880-1953), a Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, apparently considered the talmudic statement that a newborn baby gets its blood specifically from its mother (Babylonian Talmud Niddah 31a) as legally binding. He therefore ruled that blood typing could not be used as a means of ascertaining paternity, since "any scientific examination is nullified by this trustworthy tradition [that a baby's blood comes from its mother, not its father] of our sages, all of whose words were spoken by divine inspiration."

Other Orthodox rabbis disagreed with Rabbi Uzziel, finding ways to accept even those medical conclusions that appeared to contradict a "Torah" teaching. Rabbi Solomon shows that rabbis or Jewish thinkers over many generations tried to develop what he calls a "reconciling hermeneutic" – they used different strategies for dealing with perceived contradictions between what "Torah" teaches us and what we learn from science, archeology, ethics or history. While he never says this openly, it seems that he sees these harmonizing efforts as a waste of time.

Few contemporary thinkers who identify as Orthodox or are commonly perceived to be Orthodox address these issues with such candour. Toward the end of this book, Rabbi Solomon summarizes a few who do, including Menachem Kellner, Tamar Ross and David Halivni. He examines their theological suggestions, criticizes them and then presents his own theology.

Rabbi Solomon's thesis is straightforward: "The classical doctrine of 'Torah from heaven'… with its erroneous historical claims and occasionally questionable moral consequences, cannot be upheld by the serious historian, scientist or philosopher." And yet the claims that "Torah is from heaven" and that Moses wrote the Torah are, in a certain sense "true," as they are Judaism's "foundational myth."

Rabbi Solomon rushes to explain that he uses the word "myth" not in the sense of something untrue. "Myths are among the most important symbols of our life; they say what cannot be reduced to nameable facts." Furthermore, "a story can be at one and the same time both myth and history, and it is certainly more persuasive if it is both; but even without the support of history it can function effectively as myth."

Rabbi Solomon's radical thesis is unlikely to win the open support of Orthodox leaders. In fact, I'm guessing that many of them will dismiss this devout Jew out of hand. Of course, it will appeal to the thoughtful, skeptical Orthodox. And despite all the detail in the book, it is very readable and comprehensible even for a beginner. It should be required reading for any modern woman or man who thinks seriously about Jewish theology in general, and the question of Torah from heaven in particular.

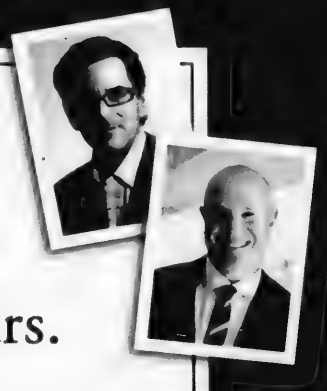
CONSTELLATION OF DISTINCTION



We want to see your name in the stars.

As we write to you, we reflect on what marks both a great honour and a great opportunity. An honour because we're unveiling an impressive list of shining stars whose generous gifts have gone beyond the call of their community. An opportunity because this is your chance to make a contribution if you haven't already. As many in our community are already aware, our Constellation of Distinction raises funds for Mount Sinai Hospital's highest priority needs - needs that are the most challenging for us to meet and yet the most critical for our Hospital. Our continued work in advancing world-renowned research and fostering the very best in patient care depends heavily on your generosity. The time for you to shine is running out. This year's Constellation of Distinction will be closing shortly and your contributions are essential to our efforts. This letter is a call to our most cherished friends and supporters. Please join this year's Constellation and take your place among our shining stars.

It's a great time to revisit classic dishes

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

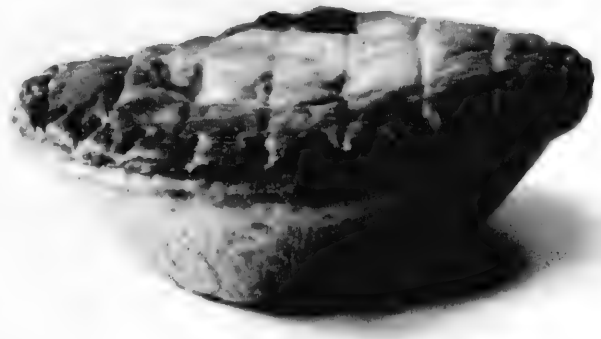
Is it not amazing that there are so many cookbooks and recipes published every year? Even for me, constantly on the prowl for new ideas and dishes, the sheer breadth of available recipes is staggering.

Most chefs and cookbook authors will tell you that a recipe is simply a starting point, that a recipe is used to familiarize you with the ingredients, techniques and order of putting things together. Because, really, cooking is all about confidence.

Once you've made a dish once, you feel confident enough to make it again and again, and even to personalize it. That's where classic renditions come in. I've updated the time-honoured chicken pie by making it with an olive oil pastry and used a pareve sauce so that the chicken is enveloped in a tasty and velvety bath. The vegetables called for are but a suggestion. You can use green beans or peas instead of the artichokes, shiitake mushrooms instead of button mushrooms and fennel instead of the celery. It's up to you.

CHICKEN POT PIE IN OLIVE OIL PASTRY

You can use all white meat or all dark meat or a combination for this one-dish meal. The pastry can be made up to three days ahead. Be sure to soften it before rolling it out and flour your work surface generously to prevent it from sticking.



2 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, chopped
2 carrots, chopped
2 stalks celery, chopped
1/2 lb. mushrooms, stems removed, sliced
1/2 lb. quartered small new potatoes
1 tsp. each salt and Italian seasoning
1/2 tsp. pepper
2 cups chopped cooked chicken
1 cup chopped canned artichokes (or frozen green beans or peas)

Sauce:
2 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. all purpose flour
1 cup chicken stock
1/2 cup coconut or soy milk

Pastry:
1-3/4 cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. baking powder
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil
1/3 cup coconut or soy milk
egg

Glaze:
1egg yolk

Pastry: In a large bowl, whisk together flour, salt and baking powder. In separate bowl, whisk together oil, coconut milk and egg and pour over dry ingredients. Using wooden spoon, stir to form a fairly smooth dough. Turn out onto lightly floured surface and knead until smooth, about 2 minutes. Press into disc, wrap with plastic wrap and refrigerate for 30 minutes. (Make-ahead: refrigerate for up to 5 days.)

Heat olive oil in saucepan set over medium heat. Add onion, carrots, celery, mushrooms, potatoes, salt, Italian seasoning and pepper. Cook, stirring, for 8 to 10 minutes or until vegetables are softened. Stir in chicken and artichokes; set aside.

Sauce: Heat oil in saucepan set over medium high heat. When hot, whisk in flour and cook, whisking, for 1 minute. Pour in stock and coconut milk. Bring to boil. Reduce heat slight and boil gently for about 8 minutes or until slightly thickened. Stir into chicken and vegetable mixture.

Preheat oven to 375. On lightly floured surface, roll out slightly more than half of pastry to 1/8th-inch thickness. Fit into bottom of a 9-inch glass pie plate. Scrape chicken-vegetable mixture into pastry-lined pie plate. Roll out remaining pastry. Moisten edge of bottom pastry with some of the egg for the glaze. Fit remaining pastry on top of filling, pressing it to adhere to bottom pastry. Crimp edges. Brush egg all over surface of pastry. Cut two steam vents on top of pastry. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 35 to 40 minutes or until filling is bubbling and pastry is golden. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

FRENCH ONION SOUP

Traditionally made with a rich beef stock, this soup is also wonderful when assembled with homemade or store bought vegetable stock. Caramelizing the onions to a deep golden colour helps impart the dark hue and richness associated with this classic meal. Day-old French bread is perfect for the topping.

3 tbsp. olive oil
5 large onions, peeled and sliced
1 large clove garlic, minced
2 tbsp. all purpose flour
1/3 cup sherry or brandy
4 cups vegetable stock, preferably low sodium
4 thick slices dry French bread
1-1/2 cups shredded Emmental or Swiss cheese

Heat oil in deep pot set over medium-high heat. Stir in onions until well coated. Cover with tight fitting lid. Cook, stirring occasionally, for 3 minutes. Remove lid. Reduce heat to medium. Cook, stirring often, for 25 to 30 minutes or until onions are golden brown. Stir in garlic for 1 minute. Sprinkle with flour and cook, stirring, for 1 minute. Stir in sherry. Cook, stirring constantly, for 2 to 3 minutes. Add vegetable stock and bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer for 30 minutes. (Soup can be brought to room temperature, covered and refrigerated for up to 48 hours. Reheat gently before proceeding.)

To serve, preheat broiler. Ladle soup evenly into 4 ovenproof bowls. Top each with bread, submerging slightly to moisten. Sprinkle generously with cheese. Brown just until the cheese has melted, 3 to 5 minutes. Makes 4 servings.

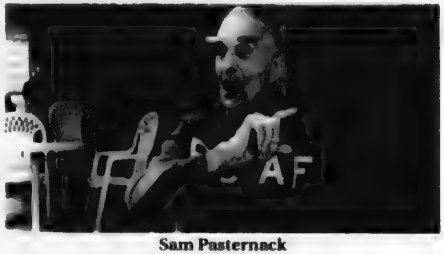
Sam Pasternack was a leader in Jewish War Veterans of Canada

Compiled by CJN staff



Sam Pasternack

Sam Pasternack, former national commander of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, passed away on Dec. 10 at the age of 88.

An airman in the Royal Canadian Air Force from 1940 to 1945, Pasternack, a Torontonian, was a decorated World War II veteran.

During his wartime service, he flew supply missions out of northern Canada and Alaska to Russia.

He was also a passionate supporter of Israel, a respected and principled local businessman and a Jewish community leader and activist.

Rabbi Irwin Groner headed Conservative rabbinical body

JTA

Rabbi Irwin Groner, a former president of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly, has died.

Rabbi Groner, who led Congregation Shaarey Zedek in Detroit for more than four decades, died Dec. 30 at a hospital in that city. He was 81 and suffered from Parkinson's disease.

He guided the Rabbinical Assembly, the international association of Conservative rabbis, from 1990 to 1992, calling it "the highlight of my professional career," according to an obituary in the Detroit Jewish News.

Rabbi Groner was named the senior rabbi at Shaarey Zedek in 1967, a year after Rabbi Morris Adler was shot and killed by a young congregant. He had been the assistant rabbi since 1959.

The Conservative congregation named Rabbi Groner rabbi for life in 1978 and emeritus rabbi in 2003.

"He was a true giant in the rabbinical world," Rabbi Joseph Krakoff of Shaarey Zedek told the Detroit Jewish News. "He was an inspiring teacher, a magnificent preacher and a man who truly understood the depth of the human condition.

"Rabbi Groner approached every situation with a smile, a sense of humor and an acute sense of caring and concern."

Rabbi Groner began his career in Little Rock, Ark., at Agudath Achim Congregation when antisemitism magnified by the civil rights movement threatened the synagogue and its rabbi. During efforts to desegregate the city's schools, Rabbi Groner refused to cancel services due to bomb threats.

He served as a member of the board of governors for the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Detroit, the Rabbinic Cabinet of the United Jewish Appeal and the board of governors of the United Synagogue. In 1984, Gov. James Blanchard appointed Rabbi Groner the first clergyman to serve on Michigan's Judicial Tenure Commission, which settles grievances in the legal community. He also was active with area interfaith programs.

Rabbi Groner was ordained at the Hebrew Theological College of Chicago, his native city. He graduated from the University of Chicago.

JTA

Rita Levi-Montalcini, an Italian biologist who defied World War II fascist antisemitism and went on to win a Nobel Prize in medicine, died at the age of 103.

Rita Levi-Montalcini

Her niece told reporters that Levi-Montalcini died quietly in her sleep on Dec. 30 at her home in Rome.

Tributes poured in for one of Italy's most admired and honoured women. The Rome newspaper Il Messaggero said news of her death was greeted on the Internet "with the same affection and same outpouring of messages as would have accompanied the death of a rock star or cinema idol."

Recognized as a moral as well as intellectual authority, Levi-Montalcini was named a Senator for Life, one of Italy's highest honours, in 2001.

"A luminous figure in the history of science has passed away," President Giorgio Napolitano said in a statement. Napolitano praised Levi-Montalcini's scientific work as well as her commitment to fostering the rights of women.

Rome Mayor Gianni Alemanno called her death a great loss "for all of humanity." In a statement, Alemanno said Levi-Montalcini had represented "civic conscience, culture and the spirit of research of our time."

Levi-Montalcini, who never married, was born to a Jewish family in Turin in 1909. During World War II, because of antisemitic restrictions by the fascist government, she worked secretly in a clandestine laboratory that she built in her bedroom.

She and her family fled Turin in 1941, first to a mountain village and in 1943 to Florence, where they spent the rest of the war in hiding. After the war, Levi-Montalcini moved to the United States and eventually divided her time between the United States and Italy.

In 1986, she shared the Nobel Prize in medicine with American biochemist Stanley Cohen for groundbreaking research that unlocked the mysteries of the cell.

E-book promotes eating for a healthy brain

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The co-authors of Women of Baycrest's new e-cookbook, MINDfull, send a strong message about maintaining brain health.

"Food can be a powerful force in the battle to save the memories and minds of women and their loved ones everywhere," Carol Greenwood, senior scientist at Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute and Canada's leading professor of nutrition and brain health, Daphna Rabinovitch, a food writer and recipe developer, and Joanna Gryfe, a food and media expert, say in their introduction.

MINDfull was spearheaded, by Greenwood, Rabinovitch said in an interview, because she is heavily involved in research into the aging brain, and her specialty is how nutrition is linked to the prevention of cognitive decline.

The book targets women from age 40 and up, she said, "because the choices we make can determine our brain's health and function much later in life.

"If we are what we eat, then we have to choose what we put on our plates carefully. Rather than thinking of it as limiting our diet, though, we have to think about how exciting food can be," Rabinovitch said.

Eating for a healthy brain is similar to eating for a healthy heart, she said. "Eat complex carbohydrates, dark leafy vegetables, and bright green vegetables such as spinach and swiss chard. As well, eat fruits, low-fat dairy products and lean protein."

The recipes promote the health benefits of a Mediterranean diet, and rely primarily on olive oil as a source of fat, and fish, chicken, dairy products and beans as a source of protein. Red meat is consumed, but monthly rather than weekly or daily, she said.

The e-cookbook is available as a $9.99 download from e-book retailers such as iTunes, Amazon and Kobo. Proceeds from the sale support Baycrest programs that promote excellence and innovations in aging and brain health.

CARMALIZED ONION AND TOMATO PHYLLO TART

3 tbsp. olive oil
3 onions, thinly sliced
4 sheets phyllo pastry
1/4 cup unsalted butter, melted
1/4 cup Dijon mustard
1 1/2 cups shredded Asiago cheese
2 tomatoes, sliced
1 large clove garlic, minced
1 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
1/4 tsp. pepper

Preheat oven to 375. Heat 2 tbsp. oil in large non-stick skillet, set over medium-low heat. Add onion and cook, stirring often until golden and carmelized, 30 to 45 minutes.

Meanwhile, cut each sheet of phyllo in half crosswise. Place 1 half on tea towel, keeping the rest covered with a damp towel. Brush sheet with some melted butter; place another sheet on top, a little askew so they are not perfectly aligned. Brush top phyllo with 1 tbsp. mustard. Keeping phyllo slightly askew, repeat layers, alternating brushing with butter and mustard until all the phyllo has been used. Transfer to 14x14-1/2 in. French tart pan with removable bottom. Fold phyllo edges under to fit.

Place onions on prepared tart; sprinkle with cheese. Top with overlapping slices of tomatoes. Sprinkle with garlic, basil and pepper. Drizzle remaining tbsp. oil over top.

Bake in centre of preheated oven until phyllo is golden, 30 to 45 minutes.

Waqf continues to destroy Temple Mount artifacts

Aryeh Savir
Tazpit News Agency

JERUSALEM — A demonstration was held on Dec. 26 at the northern entrance to the Temple Mount in protest of the Waqf's continued destruction of archeological artifacts on the Temple Mount.

The demonstrators, lead by MK Aryeh Eldad, called on Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to intervene and to stop the obliteration of these unique antiques by the Waqf.

The Waqf, a Muslim Jordanian religious body entrusted with the management of the Temple Mount, has been renovating the Temple Mount for years. In the process, they have been moving mounds of earth off the mountain. These piles contain numerous archaeological artifacts from many centuries.

In 2004, the High Court of Justice passed a ruling prohibiting the removal of the dirt from the Temple Mount elsewhere until the contents are combed for artifacts. Since then, these artifacts have been lying at the bottom of the mountain in the accumulating mounds. Many of the artifacts dug up are currently being ruined by the weather, after being preserved for centuries.

Yitzchak Dvira, an archaeologist, has recently published a report about the Waqf's continued disregard of the High Court's ruling. In his report he states that since the ruling in 2004, many piles of earth have accumulated on the eastern side of the Temple Mount, and the Waqf continues to move the earth from the Temple Mount to dump sites in eastern Jerusalem.

Dvira has documented recent incidents of heavy machinery moving earth away from the Temple Mount. These actions have brought to light the loss of important artifacts to Jewish, Christian and Muslim history on the Temple Mount.

Dvira and his crew have sifted through piles of earth removed from the Mount and have recovered many artifacts belonging to various historical periods. They have recovered seals baring the names of priests mentioned in the book of Jeremiah, support beams from the First Temple, remnants of the structure of the Second Temple, arrow heads and horseshoe nails from the Crusades Period and even artifacts from the Muslim Period, which the Waqf neglected to preserve.

Dvira states that he sees dozens of such artifacts every day in the mounds on the side of the Temple Mount. He told Tazpit News Agency that he believes the earth piles should be removed from the Temple Mount, but it should be done in a supervised fashion, ensuring no further loss of artifacts.

Dvira submitted his report to the official bodies entrusted with the supervision of the enforcement of the High Court's ruling and the preservation of the artifacts. The police have released a statement in which they declare that all construction on the Temple Mount is under their close supervision, and that Dvira's claims are incorrect. As of now, all other bodies have not provided a response.

Dvira points out that all issues regarding the Temple Mount are overseen by the Prime Minister's office, and he suspects that there is consent on their part to the Waqf's actions. It was reported that Prime Minister Netanyahu met secretly with King Abdullah of Jordan last week. Dvira believes they discussed issues related to the Temple Mount. The Jordanians have been pressuring the Israeli government to allow the removal of the earth mounds on the side of the Temple Mount.

Dvira and the Temple Mount organizations warn that this continued neglect and disregard of the law will bring the further loss of unrecoverable historical relics. They intend to petition the High Court on the issue again.

Morsi's anti-Israel bias seen in re-released video

JNS.org

In a video that was recently circulated by Egyptian media, Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi described Zionists as "bloodsuckers," "warmongers" and "descendants of apes and pigs." He made the comments when he served as the Muslim Brotherhood's official spokesman in 2010, Ynet reported.

In the video translated last week by the Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI), Morsi says, "The Zionists have no right to the land of Palestine." He also urges "military resistance" against Israel, and strongly condemns the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, which U.S. President Barack Obama was attempting to renew at that time.

"These futile [Israeli-Palestinian] negotiations are a waste of time and opportunities," Morsi said. "The Zionists buy time and gain more opportunities as the Palestinians, Arabs and Muslims lose time and opportunities and get nothing out of it."

The Muslim Brotherhood's Mohammed Morsi gives an interview to Lebanese Al-Quds TV, in October 2010 [image capture MEMRI video]

He continued by slamming Zionism.

"No reasonable person can expect progress on this track," Morsi said. "Either [you accept] the Zionists and everything they want, or else there is war. This is what the occupiers of the land of Palestine know – these bloodsuckers who attack the Palestinians, these warmongers, these descendants of apes and pigs."

Ironically, the video was used in several Egyptian media outlets to condemn Morsi for his softening position on Israel since winning Egypt's first democratic elections last June. It was included with another clip that showed Egypt's ambassador to Israel, Atef Mohamed Salem Sayed Elahl, saying, "I come with a message of peace," after he presented his credentials to Israeli President Shimon Peres.

Shas leader urges followers to leave rather than enlist

Asher Zeiger
The Times of Israel

Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, spiritual leader of the haredi Shas party, said that in order to prevent haredi yeshiva students from being forced into military or national service, they may have no choice but to leave the country.

"God forbid, we will be compelled to leave the land of Israel... in order to free the yeshiva students" from being drafted, Rabbi Yosef said in a sermon last week.

He added that "we are surrounded by haters... by enemies... by evildoers who despise the Torah." He blasted Israeli politicians who call for the drafting of haredi young men. "When will [our yeshiva students] be great scholars if they are drafted into the military?"

The idea of haredim serving alongside the general population has long been a thorn in secular-Orthodox relations within Israeli society.

Last February, the Supreme Court ruled unconstitutional the Tal Law, which granted sweeping exemptions from military or national service to haredi Israelis.

Following the ruling, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced that the Knesset would draft a revised, more equitable law within months.

In July, Netanyahu disbanded a committee headed by Kadima MK Yohanan Plesner that was seeking to draft a resolution to the issue, after some right-wing legislators resigned from the panel, citing its failure to institute a universal draft for Arab citizens as well as haredim.

Saying that adherents of the Torah are "in grave danger," Rabbi Yosef urged that in the upcoming Israeli elections, slated for Jan. 22, voters must "open [their] heart[s] and vote for the haredi parties" in order to prevent the enlistment of yeshiva students.

The rabbi further warned of the consequences awaiting anyone who voted for a non-religious party.

"On Judgment Day, God will accuse them, saying, 'You abandoned my Torah in the hands of the evildoers... who hate the Torah," he said.

Not all haredi Israelis agree with Rabbi Yosef's stance against equal service for all citizens. On Sunday, dozens of haredim arrived at the headquarters of the National Service Administration in Jerusalem to enlist in the national service corps.

According to a Government Press Office statement, more than 2,000 haredi men currently serve in the civil service corps, and of the men who have served to date, some 85 per cent were afterward successfully integrated in the workforce.

36% of likely voters describe themselves as centrists

With the undecided votes and the votes for the failing fringe parties re-distributed on a proportionate basis across the spectrum, the results are as follows:

Looking through the data for clues regarding who is undecided on the right, the merger of Yisrael Beiteinu and Likud looms large. Likely voters who voted for Likud in 2009 intend to vote 59 per cent for Likud-Beiteinu and 10 per cent for Jewish Home, but a full 20 per cent remain undecided.

Most strikingly, an analysis of former Yisrael-Beiteinu voters reveals that they did not follow party chair Avigdor Lieberman to the alliance with the Likud in overwhelming numbers. In fact, only 32 per cent of those who voted for Yisrael-Beiteinu in 2009 intend to vote for Likud-Beiteinu today. A plurality of 36 per cent remain undecided, 12 per cent vote Labor, eight per cent vote Jewish Home and eight per cent vote Yesh Atid. Look for the Likud-Beiteinu campaign to refocus efforts on energizing its former voters.

While pundits claim that Israel is moving rightward, 36 per cent of likely voters describe themselves as centrists. This voting bloc is the most important group to watch in the coming days because, with 40 per cent of its members self-professedly undecided (approximately 14 per cent of likely voters, or 17 Knesset seats), it can help decide who sits in the next government.

The battle between Likud-Beiteinu and Jewish Home for votes on the right will not likely affect the general makeup of the next coalition. However, the 40 per cent of undecideds in the centre could go either rightward, to Likud-Beiteinu and Jewish Home, or leftward, to Labor, Yesh Atid and Hatnua, not to mention Shas.

Among centrist voters who have made up their minds, twice as many vote Labor as do Likud-Beiteinu. If this trend plays out among undecided centrists, then the prediction above – with its proportionate distribution of the undecided votes – under-represents support for Labor and over-represents Likud-Beiteinu and Jewish Home.

Iranian Jewish man murdered in Tehran

Greg Tepper and Ilan Ben Zion
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — A Jewish man who was in a romantic relationship with the daughter of a member of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard was murdered in his Tehran apartment last week.

The Jewish community suspects the woman of complicity in the killing of Daniel Mahgerefteh, 24, who belonged to one of Iran's wealthier Jewish families, Israel's Channel 2 News reported on Jan. 2.

Daniel Mahgerefteh
[Channel 2 Israel Television screen capture]

According to Armin Avi Kreuznacher, an Iranian-born Jew who emigrated from the country in 2010, Mahgerefteh was killed by the woman's family after the two had intimate relations and he refused to marry her.

"The murder was carried out as revenge for dishonouring the family," said Kreuznacher, who currently resides in Germany .

Police investigators reportedly told the woman that she had "done a good deed."

However, Iranian authorities maintained that Mahgerefteh was killed during a robbery. According to the official account, the killer, who was acquainted with Mahgerefteh, came to his apartment armed with a gun and shot his host in the back. He then stole his car, eventually parking it on one of Tehran's streets and hiding from the authorities.

Police reportedly apprehended the alleged murderer, who confessed to the deed.

Menashe Amir, an expert on Iran's Jewish community, told The Times of Israel that the official account of Mahgerefteh's murder was rife with inconsistencies.

The Jewish community is afraid following Mahgerefteh's murder, the second of its kind in as many months, he said.

In November, a 57-year-old Jewish woman was brutally stabbed to death, her body mutilated by Muslim attackers, in the Iranian city of Isfahan. The woman's family said it was a religiously motivated crime with a property dispute as its pretext.

Tuba N., whose family requested that her last name not be revealed for fear of further attacks, was murdered by her Muslim neighbours, who had harassed her family for years in an attempt to drive them from their home and confiscate the property for an adjoining mosque.

"The religious radicals even expropriated part of the house and attached it to the mosque's courtyard," Amir said. "The Jewish family appealed to the courts with the help of a local attorney" to seek redress for the conflict, "despite the threats to their lives."

A government census published earlier this year indicated there were 8,756 Jews left in Iran, about one-tenth of the country's Jewish population at the time of the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

Some 10 per cent of Israelis holding doctorates are living abroad, according to an Israeli government report. They have been living abroad for at least three years for work or study, according to a report released last week by the Central Bureau of Statistics, based on figures in 2011. Some 18,025 Israelis, or five per cent, who received an advanced degree between the years 1985 and 2005 have lived outside Israel for more than three years, the report found. The report was prepared for the Science and Technology Ministry's National Council for Research and Development.

Israel-Egypt border fence

The main section of Israel's border fence with Egypt, meant to keep infiltrators from entering the country, has been completed. The nearly 150-mile stretch of fence took two years to construct at a cost of about $430 million, the Israeli Defence Ministry said. The final, nearly 12-mile section of the border fence in the mountainous region near Eilat will be completed by May. The border includes electronic surveillance equipment such as cameras and radar.

Suha Arafat on second intifadah

Yasser Arafat planned the second intifadah, his widow said in a television interview. Suha Arafat said the late Palestine Liberation Organization leader told her, in Paris, about his plans immediately following the failed summit at Camp David in 2000 that included Arafat, U.S. president Bill Clinton and Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak. "He said to me, 'You should remain in Paris.' I asked him why, and he said, 'Because I am going to start an intifadah,'" Suha Arafat recalled earlier this month during an interview with Dubai TV, according to a translation released last week by the Middle East Media Research Institute.

A boring and dangerous election

Donniel Hartman

Opinion

I am an optimist, and new elections generally inspire me to hope. As new parties and new personalities enter into the fray, I find myself anticipating the new ideas and thinking that will enter into our political discourse and open up new horizons for Israel.

This optimism often causes me to vote for the latest new party, the one that has not yet disappointed me. My track record hasn't been that great, but as an optimist, I am not inclined to allow past failures to colour my hope for the future.

This election season started with great promise, and, indeed, new parties and very talented individuals have emerged across the political spectrum. The problem is that this influx hasn't generated the expected new ideas. It is possible that this is the consequence of an election whose outcome is already clear, with the only issue up for grabs being the elements that will constitute the right-wing bloc that will lead the country afterward – whether Likud-Beiteinu will get 35 or 38 seats, or Habayit Hayehudi, 12 or 15.

The parties aren't campaigning to win, for it is already clear who will win. The campaign is about increasing one's party size by one or two seats over the latest projections and most significantly, avoiding mistakes that might lead to a decline of one to two seats.

These elections are boring. Not only are they challenging for an unrepentant optimist such as me, they are also dangerous for Israel and its future. Israel and Zionism are about ideas, about ways in which the national homeland of the Jewish People will represent and embody aspirations for justice, decency and intelligence within our foreign, military, economic and social policies. They are about creating an exemplary society, which, while grounded within realpolitik, nevertheless continually aspires to change it for the better. When Israel stops leading with ideas, and our politicians are the great protectors of the status quo, Israel becomes ever-more distanced from its true purpose.

One of the more exasperating examples of the mediocre rut into which our political thinking has descended is the debate within Likud-Beiteinu as to whether to include in the party platform Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's 2009 Bar-Ilan University speech supporting a two-state solution for Israel and the Palestinians. The speech put an end to the affiliation of the Likud party with the dreams of a Greater Israel and tacitly admitted that settlements in certain areas of Judea and Samaria would have to be dismantled for the sake of peace.

The reason given by some of the more moderate voices within the party for removing the speech from the platform is that given Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas's apparent policy to sidestep direct negotiations with Israel, we should not "reward" him with such a prize. There are others who today play a far more central role in the leadership of the Likud party, who want it removed because it contradicts their ideology, which still holds fast to the fantasy of a Greater Israel.

What both hold in common is the belief that the current status quo is sustainable and plays in Israel's favour. They are at home in a politics devoid of new ideas and may consider expending effort to produce them only after they are inspired by evidence of new thinking on the other side. This is a path that produces not a greater Israel, but a smaller one.

A second example of mediocrity is being exemplified by the Labor party's decision to avoid speaking about foreign policy in its current campaign, in the hope that a focus on economic and social justice disconnected from the party's past peace platform may "fool" one or two mandates away from the centre-right. This is a policy well at home in the current election culture and may ensure Labor the accolade of being the biggest party amongst those who lost. It is, however, a poor service to a party that in theory aspires to lead, and an even poorer service to the country.

In a democracy, the opposition plays a central role as generators of ideas and as watchdogs against stagnation. When the opposition is leading the charge down the path of complacency, the dangers to Israel's future are multiplied.

When functioning well, an election season serves to put forth noble and naive ideas that everyone knows need to be and inevitably will be tempered by the reality of the day after the elections. Cynics may argue that a campaign is about putting forth the lies that the population wants to hear. I believe that its purpose is to set forth the goals that give the electorate a window into the minds and hearts of those who aspire to represent us, the goals to which they are committed so long as reality doesn't get in the way.

We need to reconnect to the political discourse of hope and aspirations. Of course we have peace plans. Let's talk about them, debate them and figure out which ones best serve our values, goals, interests and concerns. The fact that we may have nobody to talk with has never stopped Jews from talking. We are the People of the Book, who have spent 3,000 years putting forth ideas and chiselling away at the rock of reality until we penetrate it.

Let the dreaming and talking begin. May the next month until the elections be filled with a competition over innovation, a rivalry to discover new ways to change the status quo and place Israel on a trajectory to a better future. The job of the politician is to lead. Please begin to do your job.

Donniel Hartman is president of Shalom Hartman Institute and director of the Engaging Israel Project.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

PA report says Israelis will soon be minority

Aaron Kalman
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — There will be an equal number of Palestinians and Jews in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza Strip by 2016, and by 2020 Jews will be a minority in the area, the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics said on Jan. 1.

Such a situation would end the chances for a two-state solution, former Palestinian Authority official Hanan Ashrawi said, implying that Palestinians would not be interested in just the West Bank and Gaza if they could demographically dominate a binational state from the Jordan to the Mediterranean.

At the end of 2012, there were 11.6 million Palestinians around the world, the report said, including 4.4 million in the Palestinian Authority and 1.4 million who were Israeli citizens. More than 36 per cent of the Israeli Arabs were under the age of 15, it found.

The fertility rate within the West Bank and Gaza Strip has been on the decline over recent years, the bureau reported. From an average of six children per family in 1997, the number dropped to 4.4 in 2008. As a result, the average household got smaller — from 6.4 to 5.6 in the PA.

The vast majority of the rest of the Palestinians were living in other Arab countries in the region, compared to only 655,000 who lived in non-Arab countries around the world.

Recent numbers released by the Central Bureau of Statistics in Jerusalem, showed Israel's population at just below eight million, with 6,015,000 of those Jewish. The country's growth rate is 1.8 per cent, while it is 2.4 per cent among Arabs.

If the predictions are true, it would cause "a demographic problem that would endanger the two-state solution and lead both sides, de facto, to a one-state solution," Ashrawi told Ynet. One state would be uncomfortable for Israelis and Palestinians, the former PA legislator said.

"If the situation carries on this way, at the end we'll be a majority, but we're giving the Israelis a chance to understand the Palestinians could have their own democratic country that would neighbour Israel," Ashrawi said.

The reason the Israelis weren't actively pursuing a two-state solution was because they could do "as they wished" in the field without anyone stopping them, Ashrawi — a former negotiator — told the Hebrew news site.

Jerusalem believes it can go on like this forever, she said. "The Israeli government needs to internalize that we're not going to disappear and that it'll have to accept the idea of a Palestinian state."

Intel developing 'perceptual computing' in Israel

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — With the computers of tomorrow, users will no longer have to input data. Powerful new software is going to enable computers and devices to figure out what information you need, and provide it without even having to be asked. And they will do so using cameras, sensors, and microphones that are capable of close-range hand and finger tracking, speech recognition, face analysis and 2D/3D object tracking.

It's the next generation of Intel technology, designed to boost computing devices to new levels of capability and productivity. And according to an Intel spokesperson, much of this technology is being developed at the company's Haifa development centre.

The new approach, called "perceptual computing," refers to equipping PCs, laptops, and other Intel-branded and partnered devices to become "context aware." Instead of passively waiting for you to enter data and "teach" the device, a perceptual computing-equipped device will use its built-in hardware and software to "learn" ways that make users' lives easier.

To that end, Intel is offering developers $1 million in prizes to come up with the software of tomorrow, in the Intel Perceptual Computing Challenge. The contest is open to anyone, and will reward the developers who come up with the applications that take the best advantage of Intel's new Perceptual Computing platform. The entries will be judged based on how perceptual an application is – how much does it utilize the sensors, cameras, etc. – how intuitive and easy to use the app is, how likely users are to want to adopt it. Four top winners will get $20,000 each (all figures US), with smaller prizes of $5,000 and $1,000 for lesser, but still good, efforts. Altogether, the company will be giving away one million dollars.

Intel CTO Justin Rattner laid out the perceptual computing vision at the 2010 Intel Developer Forum. "Imagine a device that uses a variety of sensory modalities to determine what you are doing at an instant, from being asleep in your bed to being out for a run with a friend," Rattner said. "By combing hard sensor information such as where you are and the conditions around you combined with soft sensors such as your calendar, your social network and past preferences, future devices will constantly learn about who you are, how you live, work and play.

"As your devices learn about your life, they can begin to anticipate your needs. Imagine your PC advising you to leave the house 10 minutes early for your next appointment due to a traffic tie-up on your way to work. Consider a 'context aware' remote control that instantly determines who is holding it and automatically selects the Smart TV preferences for that person. All this may sound like science fiction, but this is the promise of 'context-aware' computing and we can already demonstrate much of it in the lab."

Over two years later, the technology has moved beyond the lab, and into a development kit (SDK) that Intel is offering developers to build applications that will take full advantage of the perceptual computing platform. Several weeks ago, Intel announced that it had fully integrated voice recognition into the SDK. And, developers can now order an interactive gesture camera (developed in part by Intel and sold by Creative) in order to test their perceptual apps.

Israel has long loomed large in the Intel universe, having been the main development site for many of Intel's laptop processors; the Sandy Bridge processor, developed in Israel, was responsible for 40 per cent of Intel's sales worldwide in 2011. In return, Intel has been an important part of Israel's tech success. The company has four design centres and two fabrication plants in the country, and it is Israel's largest private sector employer. About 8,000 workers are employed by Intel Israel, and taking into account the company's ecosystem – partners, suppliers, support businesses – Intel is responsible for providing jobs to about one out of every 10 Israelis employed in the technology sector.

The computer world is changing, and Intel is changing as well – but the company plans to take Israel along for the ride. Mooly Eden, Intel corporate vice-president and general manager of the PC client group, who has been with Intel since 1982, was recently appointed CEO of Intel Israel. He also happens to be head of Intel's Perceptual Computing unit.

In a speech at this year's Intel Developer Forum, Intel senior VP David Perlmutter – an Israeli who is among the top candidates to replace Paul Otellini as CEO when the latter steps down next year – discussed the perceptual computing effort in depth, describing the "touchscreens, sensors, cameras and other things we are driving into small devices." As Intel moves computing to a whole new level, Israel will be moving along with it, he said.

Apple may be interested in Israeli map app Waze

Michal Shmulovich
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Apple is rumoured to be looking into buying the Israeli satellite navigation application Waze, which has become a worldwide hit thanks to its melding of crowd sourcing and traffic mapping.

A possible offer stands at about $400-$500 million (all figures US), industry insiders speculated, but the successful startup, which offers maps, driving directions and real-time traffic reports to mobile users, is estimated to be worth closer to $1 billion, according to the Calcalist financial newspaper.

U.S.-based tech blog TechCrunch reported that Waze is seeking $750 million, and negotiations could take time.

Waze, founded in 2009, uses satellite signals and reports of members to generate maps and real-time traffic data that it then offers to smartphone users around the world. Waze's image data improves as more users – the number now hovers around 30 million, according to the firm – join the network. The app displays users' information anonymously (unless they choose to identify themselves), and suggests quicker, alternative routes to drivers, as well as warning of potential hazards like traffic accidents and police activity.

Waze has raised a total of $67 million so far from a series of investors. Its revenues in 2012 were $1 million, mostly from location-based ads, which integrate mobile advertising and the ability to pinpoint consumers.

Waze also caught the eye of other technology giants, like Facebook, which was reportedly considering acquiring the app.

In September, Apple dropped its contract with Google, which had previously supplied the data for the iPhone's own map app. However, customers complained about Apple's proprietary map software, claiming it was an inferior version of Google's, leading Apple to reinstate Google Maps as a downloadable, external app in December. Within 48 hours of its release as a free app, Google Maps for iPhone was downloaded over 10 million times, according to The Telegraph.

According to YNet News, Waze said there was a spike in the download of its app after Apple CEO Tim Cook, in an unusual move after the launch of iPhone 5, suggested that customers download rival mapping services, like Waze, until Apple had a chance to improve its own maps.

Exhibit features a variety of headcoverings

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

An eclectic and creative exhibit titled Cover Thy Head: Headdresses and Identities recently opened at the Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum at the Baycrest Health Sciences centre, with hats representing many cultures, regions and professions.

The exhibit includes a juried art show of 50 kippot (yarmulkes) submitted by artists from around the world.

There is also a photographic installation that features members of the Baycrest community in their favourite hats along with their personal stories.

People are invited to contribute their stories of hats that are meaningful to them.

Cover Thy Head is open to the public and will remain at Baycrest until July.

Lois Buckstein, who co-chairs the museum with Sandra Temes, told The CJN, "We see the Cover Thy Head exhibit as an opportunity to reflect on the beauty of diversity and, at the same time, to honour our Jewish heritage.

"In developing the hat exhibit, we built on the museum's long-standing tradition of inviting members of the community to contribute to the exhibit. In addition to our local community, we also reached out to the international art and Jewish communities for the juried competition."

She noted that Baycrest contacted artist groups, guilds, art schools, synagogues and social clubs to invite artists to submit original kippot they designed and created.

"We were amazed by the response," Buckstein said.

Musician merges spiritual and secular sounds

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Despite decades working in the music industry, Allan Soberman is still searching for his voice.

The 62-year-old musician has released the followup to his first album of prayer songs, which he called Searching for my Voice. The sequel is called The Quest Continues.

In the album, Soberman, whose years in the music industry included playing with the support act for a Billy Joel concert at Toronto's Maple Leaf Gardens, takes tunes usually heard in synagogue and blends them with Beach Boy-esque harmonies.

The music takes audiences to where they last heard the melodies – most likely a synagogue, he says. This built-in familiarity is what draws much of the audience to the music.

"I've got them already," he says, "so I can put my craziness into part of it."

This "craziness" refers to what he calls the strangeness of the choir sounds. "Someone looking for a cantorial CD might be surprised," he says.

However, the music isn't just for religious – or even secular – Jews. Soberman says even people who don't recognize the sounds will enjoy it, and may feel a sense of spirituality simply because of the language of the songs, all of which are sung in Hebrew or Yiddish.

"I hope they would appreciate the musicality, the arrangements, the sounds," he says. "It's pretty hip stylistically but it still has those melodies."

Allan Soberman's new album mixes cantorial and pop influences.

The tunes and words are especially familiar to Soberman, whose father, Morris, was a cantor at Beth Tzedec Congregation for more than 35 years.

Soberman got the idea for the album back in 1999, shortly after his father died. He found recordings of his father performing wedding receptions and singing bar mitzvah portions, which students would use to learn their portions. He took these recordings, cleaned them up, and released them in 2001 on an album called A Dedication.

"That's what started me on this road," he says.

The next album, Searching for my Voice, blended the cantorial songs with Soberman's own harmonic and folk style for the first time.

"I was treading on unknown waters," he said of that release. "What was I doing with Shalom Alechem?"

This album was much easier, he said, now that he has the experience and confidence.

However, life threw him more challenges during the recording of this album. Before the album was finished, Soberman's mother died, and even six months later, he says he's still "crawling out of the debris" of his mother's passing.

Nevertheless, the fact that he could incorporate so much of his own music – specifically the pop harmonies – into his father's music means he was able to find a little bit of closure with his family, he says.

"I'm the last one standing, so there's a lot of catharsis going on here," he says, speaking to The CJN from a telephone in his childhood basement.

Although it's only 12 years that Soberman has released these albums, he has been involved in the music industry for much longer. He spent decades playing mainly bass guitar on tour with big artists such as Grammy Award-winning Dan Hill and Ben Mink.

One of his favourite memories, he says, is performing shows with Billy Crystal at The Bitter End, a famous club in New York City. He says Crystal opened for his band one week, and they swapped spots for a second week.

"By the end of the two weeks, I knew his routine backwards," Soberman says.

Another notable moment for him was when Beach Boy Bruce Johnston expressed interest in getting involved with the publishing of Soberman's music.

"Nothing really ever came of it, but that was a big thrill for me to get phone calls from a guy who actually sang on God Only Knows. That was a big deal for me," he said.

His love for the Beach Boys is what inspired the harmonies that fill his new album. He recorded it alone, layering his voice to create a choral effect. Although it works well for an album, he says, it leads to challenges in performing the music.

The goal, he says, is to perform the music with a full choir, but he hasn't figured out the logistics of organizing it. Specifically, it's hard to find a choir before the show is booked, but he can't book a show without a choir.

"I can do the musical end, but how do you put the business end?" he says. In the meantime, he could perform with a small group – perhaps three or four people – but it wouldn't reflect the sound he imagines in his mind.

Ideally, the performance would take place as part of a larger event or festival, he says. Regardless, he would like to bring it to the Jewish community to share the music that has become so meaningful to him.

"It's my connection to going to shul with my father," he says. "It's me incorporating what I am into it."

Exhibit features a variety of headcoverings

The judges for the competition were Sarah Quinton, curatorial director at the Textile Museum of Canada, and Chung-Im Kim, artist and associate professor at OCAD University.

Ken Goldman was awarded the first-place prize for his original design titled With and Without. Goldman shaved his hair into the shape of a kippah, and his head became a piece of art. He also received honorable mention for his creative kippah, The Wandering Jew.

Joyce Goodman won second place for her piece, Footprints. Third place was awarded to Ben Herskowitz for A Bright Idea, and the Juror's Choice Award was presented to Lea Winkler for Seder Plate.

Bianca Stern, director of the department of culture, arts and innovation at Baycrest, said the Heritage Museum is a small gem on the Baycrest campus.

"It's a hub of cultural learning. Every exhibit is a springboard for discussion groups, reminiscing, storytelling and a museum on wheels visits."

She added that through its exhibits, "the Justein Museum maintains an ongoing dialogue and connection to both the Jewish community and the non-Jewish community, bridging areas we all have in common."

Temes, who presented the awards said the museum is a cultural and integral part Baycrest for residents, staff, visitors and the Jewish community."

"I am delighted with the response to the exhibition," museum assistant Cassandra Zita said. "We've had great interest in our ongoing docent-led tours, from both Baycrest clients and local school groups.

"The feedback has been very positive. Visitors are pleasantly surprised at the diversity of head coverings we have collected. The hats on display have prompted great conversations and memories."

Author treats obesity with light-hearted sensitivity

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Edie Middlestein is grossly overweight, diabetic and about to have her second stent surgery. She is also in danger of needing a bypass surgery.

If that's not enough, after 30 years of marriage, her husband Richard has given up on her and is about to leave her. Their two adult children, Robin and Benny, are worried about what to do. Because one thing is clear: Edie is slowly eating herself to death.

So begins The Middlesteins (Grand Central), the delightful third novel by New York-based writer Jami Attenberg.

Each chapter shifts the perspective from one of the family members to another, but the focus is always the gluttonous matriarch, Edie.

Benny is an easy-going pot smoker who has a pair of teenage twins he and his wife, Rachelle, conceived during a drunken fling in the bathroom of a frat house on their graduation day.

Robin is a single teacher who is having an affair with her "I-guess-he's-my-boyfriend," Daniel, who lives in the apartment below hers.

Edie was always fat. She weighed 62 pounds at age five. Her immigrant mother always knew she was overweight, but how could she not feed her daughter? If it could stop her from crying, then what was wrong with it, she thought? She would also drop her groceries to carry her up the apartment stairs, because Edie was incapable of doing it herself.

Edie grew up in a house where her father and his friends would sit together talking about Golda Meir and their donations to Israel.

In high school, weighing over 200 pounds, Edie ate on behalf of Golda recovering from cancer. She ate in tribute to Israel. But most importantly, she ate because she loved to eat.

She became a lawyer but was given early retirement, and a "not unfair amount of money" to keep quiet about the fact that she was being let go because of her embarrassing (for the firm) weight.

Even the night before her surgery, she couldn't help herself if she went down to the kitchen for just a little sandwich.

She would go to McDonald's and order a rib sandwich and a Big Mac, but thoughtfully took out the middle slice of bread because she heard from Weight Watchers that half the battle was the bread.

Her husband, Richard, was the owner of a small chain of pharmacies, Middlestein pharmacies. It was a successful business until the '90s when his loyal Jewish clientele moved or died and the younger ones had no ties to him or the community.

Attenberg does a good job of tackling this heavy subject with a light, humorous, yet compassionate touch

He begins meeting women online right after leaving his wife (he bookmarks a Jewish dating site on his computer). At first, he tries younger women, but when that never advances beyond first dates, he changes his parameters to women who are more age appropriate, a motley collection of widows and divorcees, and one woman, a "half-hooker" who is looking for him to "be my daddy."

His children take their mother's side during the separation and are disappointed that their father left their mother at such a crucial time. He is especially hurt that he is shut out from visiting his twin grandchildren.

Benny's wife, Rachelle, takes the lead in trying to save Edie, by making her healthy meals and encouraging Benny to visit her every day.

But Rachelle's care borders on the obsessive as she takes to following her mother-in-law around like an undercover cop, taking note of where and how often she's eating. "She's at the Superdairy – 3 hot dogs!!!" she would email or text her husband.

THE Middlesteins
A NOVEL
"THE MIDDLESTEINS had me from its first few pages, but it wasn't until its final pages that I fully appreciated the genius of Attenberg's sympathy and the artistry of her storytelling."
JONATHAN FRANZEN

Robin, who was fat herself as a child before she consciously started to lose weight in high school, is especially bitter at her father for leaving instead of caring for her mother. She understands that Edie needs to stop eating right away, but is unable to convince her.

Although the main story line begins with news of Edie and Richard's separation and leads up to the twins' bnei mitzvah, the timeline is otherwise quite fluid, with several flashbacks and even a few flash-forwards.

The author takes the brave and unusual step of writing parts of the book in the future tense, and one chapter, about the aforementioned bnei mitzvah, is written in the rare first-person plural, as we see the event from the points of view of all the old Jewish friends of the family.

The novel seems to be asking who's to blame for Edie's obesity? Is it her mother for feeding her out of love and kindness? Is it her husband who only felt disgust and chose to leave her for thinner women? Is it her children who stood by, not intervening until it was too late? What about her friends and neighbours who watched her eat but didn't think it was their place to intervene? Or was it Edie herself who was smart enough to understand the consequences of her habit?

The Middlesteins is a light-hearted telling of a tragic story. Calling it a comedy might be an exaggeration. It is, after all, a sad tale and the main protagonist is dying. But Attenberg does a good job of tackling this heavy subject with a light, humorous, yet compassionate and sensitive touch. It does not get weighted down (yes, pun intended) with serious melodrama.

Readers will likely enjoy this slice-of-life novel.

Stars of David eliminated in tournament semi-final

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

As the reigning champs, it would have been nice if the Israeli Stars of David had advanced to the title game of the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championships (CMHC).

Still better if they'd won their fourth championship in five years. But it was not to be, as an undermanned Davids fell 5-2 to the Nubian Kings in the tournament's premier division semi-finals. With key players either unavailable or injured – particularly its veteran leadership – the Stars of David didn't quite have what it takes to repeat, said the team's general manager Alex Voihanski.

The Stars of David never recovered from a four-goal onslaught in the first five minutes of the semi-final – including two goals allowed while enjoying a man advantage, he said.

"We were behind the 8-ball before you could blink," he said. "We took it to them after that and outscored them 2-1."

The Kings, though big and talented, have lost to the Davids three years in a row coming into this winter's tournament, Voihanski added.

Still and all, the Davids did manage to record a 3-1 round robin record and make it to the final four of the tournament's premier elite division for the fifth year in a row.

The Davids bring speed and smarts to the event, but it was not enough to overcome the absence of key performers from previous years. Stacey Britstone, who played for the Oshawa Generals and Plymouth Whalers as a younger man, was unavailable due to recurring knee problems. He's been the Davids' captain. Former assistant captain Alon Eizenman, who played professionally in France, was likewise not available. In past tourneys, Eizenman centred the team's number 1 line, played on the power play, killed penalties and provided the steadying influence on the ice and in the dressing room, Voihanski stated.

Also missing from previous winning teams was goaltender Kevin Kline, a former NCAA division 1 netminder who has moved to Vancouver, and goalie Sal Cutillo, who has been a tournament MVP.

Adding to the team's woes was the injury after the round robin to Adam Weinberg, a first line winger and the team captain.

"It was a huge loss," said Voihanski. With our regulars gone, "we became a young team very quickly." The Stars of David, which have blended youth and experience to become the team to beat, missed its veteran leadership.

Shawn Frank, who played for the Barrie Colts, ended up the second leading scorer in the tournament while Noah Schwartz, who played for the Hamilton Red Wings and "had a cup of coffee" with the London Knights, rounded out the team's top line.

Another of the team's top players, Zach Sternberg, who plays defence for Lake Superior State, had to return to school prior to the elimination round. Sternberg was clearly the best defenceman in the tournament, said Voihanski.

Despite the early exit, there were other bright lights for the Davids: Adam Corrin made his debut on the team. He's a "smooth player, defensively oriented who has good hands," Voihanski said. He played for Colgate University in the first division of the NCAA.

"For the first time ever, we had an Arab Israeli on the team, Andrew Wakileh. His parents are Christian Arabs from Israel."

A former captain of the Markham Waxers, Wakileh plays with Voihanski in a men's league.

"He loved it. A lot of his friends are Jewish," Voihanski said.

The team was coached by Akiva Aaronson and Ziv Zukier.

Table tennis standout skips match for Shabbat

JTA

NEW YORK — An 11-year-old New York girl was disqualified from the 2012 U.S. National Table Tennis Championships when she opted not to play her final match, which fell on Shabbat.

Estee Ackerman of Long Island told the New York Post that, "Ping-pong is important to me, but my religion of Judaism is also very important to me."

Ackerman, who is ranked fourth nationally in the eight-to-11 age bracket, did not play in the match that fell on the evening of Dec. 21, a Friday night. She told the Post the unfortunate scheduling was "disappointing" after training six months for the tournament.

Some 800 players participated in the five-day event in Las Vegas. Ackerman said she does not blame event organizers for the scheduling conflict.

She told the newspaper that she hopes to one day represent the United States in table tennis at the Olympics.

Ackerman routinely beats players in their 20s and 30s, according to the Post.

Toronto group brings gay Jewish men together

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

The last thing Corbin Seligman wanted to do was to date someone not Jewish. That's when he came up with the idea to throw events for Jewish gay men.

"I always joke about it, but I'm only half-joking when I say I want a Jewish doctor," said Seligman, a Toronto real estate agent. "Really, in the end, we [gay men] want that traditional family as much as possible because it's something you can't have."

He threw the idea around with his friends and realized the need was even greater than he first realized. A few weeks later, he started CUT Toronto, posted an event on Facebook and invited a few friends. He expected about 10 people but 150 showed up.

"I felt amazing," he said about the huge turnout. "I was on a high for a week after the first party."

Since its founding three years ago, Seligman has hosted about four events a year so Jewish gay men can meet each other, including holiday events such as the Xmas Eve Matzo Balls party last month. "I knew that there were Jewish gay guys in Toronto, but I didn't know that many because I had just moved back to Toronto from Montreal," he said.

His hunch was correct. He discovered there were many gay Jewish men in Toronto who had no casual venue to meet each other. He gets anywhere between 150 to 250 people at his parties – the majority of whom are gay Jewish men looking to meet young bachelors or just stay connected to the Jewish community.

"Lots of us only date other Jewish guys, which I think is sort of strange, because in the straight community a lot of people are straying away from that," he said. "Because we're already – I hesitate to say on the fringe – sort of different, we try to be as normal, with quotation marks, as possible."

That's the reason Andrew Oz decided to attend one of Seligman's events.

"If there are people who are looking to find community or a relationship with other queer Jews, then CUT seems to be the ideal place for that to happen. It is less formal and politically charged than many other events for the queer Jewish community," said Oz, a University of Toronto linguistics student. He met his current boyfriend at a CUT event two years ago.

"He and I would have absolutely not met had it not been for Corbin's party," said Oz. "It makes the parents happy in at least one regard."

The goal of the events is to provide a casual, fun atmosphere, sometimes with a Jewish theme, like their party for Rosh Hashanah, so that gay Jewish men can comfortably meet one another. They don't specifically pair up different singles, but encourage them to mingle and meet new people. "I wanted to keep it informal," said Seligman. "That's what people wanted – something more organic."

He said CUT differs from Kulanu – a Jewish, social, cultural and educational organization that is geared toward to lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered people in Toronto.

"We focus on the 'meet and greet and party' because Kulanu does a lot of stuff involving Pride Week. They do potluck Shabbat dinners and work in the community, so I wanted to shy away from that because I think that's branded in one way and I'm branded in another," he said.

While the events have been gaining more popularity with each passing one – "if I wait several months without doing one, then I get people messaging me, saying, 'When's the next one?'" Seligman says. He hopes to plan larger events in the future.

"I would love to organize a trip to Israel, to go to the Tel Aviv Pride Parade with a group of gay Jewish guys," said Seligman. "Just to sort of reconnect with gay men and Jewish roots."

After all, he pointed out, Jewish gay men have a lot of hurdles to overcome if they want to preserve their roots and create a Jewish family.

"Even though people in the community acknowledge that there must be a struggle between being gay and Jewish, they don't really get it. To find a surrogate takes a long time. Or to adopt. These processes are hard and expensive, and for us to not be able to easily have a traditional family makes us want it all that more," said Seligman.

"I want to be able to balance my Jewish identity with my sexual orientation," he said, "and I think that these events allow me to do just that while helping others to do the same."

"תזכור, זו לא אותה טלי שמתארחת אצלינו עם בעלה והבנות. זו לא טלי המנומסת והאימהית. כשאנחנו יושבות לבד בקפה, יוצא ממנה פאן אחר. תתכונן."

ROAST POTATOES
(WITH TRICK FOR CRISPINESS)

- 1 kg. potatoes
- 1 tsp. salt
- 2 tbsps. light soy sauce
- 1/2 c. oil
- few sprigs of herbs and/or halved garlic cloves

Pre-heat oven to 400° F. Peel potatoes; cut into large chunks. Place in a pot; cover with water. Add salt and soy sauce; bring to boil. Simmer 5 min.

While potatoes are simmering, pour oil into large roasting pan. Place pan in oven.

Drain water out of pot cooking the potatoes; put potatoes back into the pot. Put a lid on and give it a shake. This roughens the outer layer of the potato pieces giving them a crust when roasted. Carefully add potatoes to hot oil in roasting pan. Stir to coat well with oil. Spread into a single layer. Scatter herbs and garlic on top. Roast 40 min. or until browned and crisped, turning halfway through the cooking time. Transfer to a serving dish and serve.

The Holocaust. The Roma. Canadian refugees?

According to Toby Sonneman, the author of Shared Sorrows: A Gypsy Family Remembers the Holocaust, "this story still has not been told fully... and this lack of recognition impacts not only how we understand the past but also how we see the present."

Sonneman adds, "Without full acknowledgment that Gypsies were victims of the Holocaust, too little attention is paid to the current situation in Europe, where Gypsies are frequently victims of prejudice and racially motivated mob attacks."

Here are some facts you should know.

- The "Gypsies" or the "Roma," an ethnic group from India, arrived in Europe in the late Middle Ages and became a part of the ethnic mix of many countries.
- 1929: the Germany establishes the Centre for the Fight Against Gypsies.
- 1933: Jews, Gypsies and disabled are classified as "inferior peoples" in Germany.
- The Nuremberg Laws of 1935 aimed at the Jews are amended to include the Gypsies.
- 1936: the first German Gypsies are arrested and deported to Dachau concentration camp.
- 1938: June 13-18, 1,000 Gypsies are deported to concentration camps. Late summer, 3,000 more are deported from Austria. On Nov. 9-10, Kristallnacht, the notorious night of broken glass, occurred in Germany.
- 1940: 3,000 Gypsies are deported to Poland, and trainloads of Gypsies are transported from Vienna.
- 1941: Gypsy children are expelled from public schools in the Reich. Gypsies from Lackenbach concentration camp are deported to Lodz Ghetto in Poland.
- 1942: 5,000 Gypsies are deported from Lodz concentration camp to Chelmno and killed in mobile gas vans.
- 1942: Nazi extermination camps in occupied Poland begin gassing Jews, Gypsies and others, and Gypsies are transferred from Buchenwald to Auschwitz to build a Gypsy enclosure in Birkenau.
- 1943: most Gypsies in Germany are arrested and sent to Auschwitz.
- 1944: The Gypsy camp at Auschwitz-Birkenau is liquidated, and 3,000 Gypsies are gassed in a single night.
- 1945: Nazis evacuate Auschwitz and prisoners begin "death marches" toward Germany.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

It's generally thought 500,000 Gypsies were murdered by the Nazis. Some sources, however, suggest the number could be much higher.

On Aug. 5, 2012, 5,000 neo-Nazis marched on Devecser, a Hungarian village that's populated mostly by Roma, yelling, "You are going to die here." They threw water bottles and stones at houses where Roma lived. Most of the mob was bused in. The leaders of the groups marching included Gabor Ferenczi of Jobbik, a far-right political party that won 16 per cent of the vote in the last Hungarian elections. Recently, Jobbik called for a list of "influential Jews" in Hungary. In 2009, a Roma father and son were murdered there. Google "Roma Hungary." There is much more.

Here's what Amnesty International says about the Roma today: "The Roma community suffers massive discrimination throughout Europe. Denied their rights to housing, employment, health care and education, Roma are often victims of forced evictions, racist attacks and police ill treatment. Roma are among the most deprived communities in Europe. Romani children are frequently unjustifiably placed in 'special' schools, where curtailed curricula limit their possibilities for fulfilling their potential."

In December, the Canadian government created a list of 27 "safe" countries. Refugee claims filed by people from these countries are mostly considered to be bogus. These refugee claimants will be fast-tracked, with no right of appeal for a negative decision. Hungary is on that list.

Toronto couple killed in Florida

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Funeral services were held Monday for a Toronto couple found dead last week in their Hallandale Beach, Fla., condominium townhouse. Local police are investigating their deaths as a double homicide.

David (Donny) Pichosky, 71, and his wife Rochelle Wise, 66, had been married about four years and were active members of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto.

A concerned neighbour found them Jan. 10 after they didn't show up for lunch the previous day and failed to answer repeated phone calls.

On Monday, Capt. Sonia Quinones, a spokesperson for the Hallandale Beach Police, said that police "are continuing the investigation into the homicide. We are awaiting the medical examiner's report for determination of the cause of death. Motive is still unknown at this time."

Pichosky, a volunteer helping seniors at Baycrest in Toronto, had retired after selling his office-carpet business and had spent at least 20 years wintering in Florida.

Wise was a former preschool administrator at Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School and a founding director of Crestwood Valley Day Camp in the city.

In Florida, she volunteered at a Hebrew day school in Hallandale, helping children with learning problems. She also was an active member of Na'amat, the Jewish women's organization.

In Toronto, Bialik issued a statement Jan. 11 saying that the "entire Bialik family is distraught by the tragic loss of Rochelle Wise and her beloved husband Donny Pichosky. Rochelle was an adored member of the community and respected as an outstanding educator and woman of great character and kind spirit."

Bobby Freeman, a co-director of Crestwood, wrote in an online condolence message that he came to know Wise as "a unique woman, with strength of character, foresight, and the ability to lead with love."

Loewy Exits Alliance

TORONTO — Ex-Montrealer Victor Loewy resigned as CEO of Alliance Films last week as rival film distributor Entertainment One completed its $225-million acquisition of the Montreal-based company. Loewy, a dominant figure in Canadian film distribution for 40 years, co-founded Alliance with Robert Lantos in 1985. Its parent firm was acquired by CanWest Global and Goldman Sachs in 2007, but it became a stand-alone company when Shaw bought CanWest's broadcasting assets after CanWest's bankruptcy.

WORLD

FIFA Fine Appealed

BUDAPEST — The Hungarian Football Federation says it will appeal sanctions imposed on it by the world soccer body for its fans' antisemitic behaviour. FIFA fined the Hungarian federation $43,000 Jan. 8 for chants of "stinking Jews" and "Heil Benito Mussolini" by its fans during a friendly match in Budapest in August against the Israeli national team. The Hungarian fans also turned their backs as Hatikvah was played and waved Palestinian and Iranian flags throughout the game. FIFA also ruled Hungary will have to play its next match, in March against Romania, in an empty stadium. Hungary's far-right Jobbik party said it would hold a protest outside the venue during the game to show support.

Lew Nominated

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Barack Obama nominated Jack Lew, his chief of staff, to be secretary of the treasury. If the Senate confirms him, he'll succeed Timothy Geithner. Lew, a chief of the Office of Management and Budget under both Obama and president Bill Clinton, is the highest-ranking Orthodox Jew in U.S. government history and has spoken on balancing observance with the demands of his jobs.

WWII Witness Found

BUDAPEST — Slovak police say they've found a witness to corroborate charges against Laszlo Csatary, 97, a Hungarian war criminal and former Montrealer. Csatary served as a Hungarian police commander in World War II in the Jewish ghetto of Kosice, then a part of Hungary and now in Slovakia. The Kosice investigation focuses on Csatary's alleged involvement in the deportation of 15,000 Jews from the city. The witness, whose identity hasn't been revealed, survived the expulsion and reportedly has "accurate" information about Csatary's actions as police commander of the local ghetto. The Budapest Public Prosecutor asked Slovak authorities to question the witness. After the war, Csatary fled Hungary for Canada, where he was granted citizenship in 1955. He was sentenced to death in absentia by Czechoslovakia in 1948. In 1997, he left Canada to avoid expulsion after it turned out his citizenship application contained false data. Csatary, who was put under house arrest in Budapest last July, denies the charge. In August, he was cleared in Hungary of other charges pertaining to the deportation of 300 Jews from Kosice to their deaths at a camp in Ukraine in 1941.

OT Goal Leads Princeton Past Harvard

NEW YORK — Andrew Calof, a member of the Canadian Maccabiah hockey team, netted his first collegiate hat trick – including the game winner in overtime – to send Princeton past Harvard 3-2 earlier this month.

Andrew Calof

Calof's third goal came 58 seconds into overtime as the Tigers fended off an upset bid by their Ivy League rival Crimson, who rallied from a 2-0 deficit in the Jan. 4 game.

Calof, 21, a junior chemical and biological engineering major, leads the Tigers with eight goals and 12 assists through 16 games. In November, the Ottawa native was named to Maccabi's Team Canada roster for the 2013 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Beth Tikvah leaves Conservative body

Cost, not philosophical differences led to decision to leave USCJ

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Beth Tikvah Synagogue has left the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ) – almost five years after voting to stay in the umbrella organization for Judaism's Conservative movement – because it felt it wasn't using the group's services.

In 2008, Beth Tikvah's reasons for reconsidering its affiliation with the USCJ were philosophical differences regarding ritual observance and lack of responsiveness to the congregation's needs.

But philosophical differences "don't enter into it" any more, shul president Bob Weill told The CJN. The synagogue became Torah egalitarian last year. "At this point, we don't need [the USCJ]. It became more of, 'We weren't taking advantage of anything they offered.'"

However, Weill said, "We are a Conservative shul and will remain a Conservative shul."

Rabbi Howard Markose, interim senior rabbi of the 1,100-family shul, said in a phone interview that being a Conservative synagogue means "continuing to be committed to Halachah – Jewish law – with the flexibility in interpretation that is part of our Conservative theology and philosophy."

Bob Weill

Rabbi Markose and his colleague Rabbi Jarrod Grover chose not to be involved in the decision regarding the USCJ. "We neither encouraged the departure nor discouraged it," Rabbi Markose said in a phone interview from Israel.

"We decided as a team of rabbis to give the synagogue membership the opportunity to go through the process and make the decision without rabbinic input. It's not really a halachic issue, which is what our major decision-making and guidance is about – trying to promote observance and halachic adherence. We determined this is more a political issue than a halachic or religious issue."

Rabbi Grover, in his column in Beth Tikvah's most recent shul bulletin, encouraged members to continue to support other Conservative institutions, including the Jewish Theological Seminary, Mercaz Canada (the movement's Zionist arm), and Camp Ramah.

Scapegoaters' perfidy

From ancient times until today, some rulers – usually, but not always, demagogues and despots – have scapegoated an "other" to explain away the misery of the masses over whom they rule. Pointing to a scapegoat, they perpetuate a sense of injustice, thus tethering their people even tighter to manipulation and false nostrums. They stoke fires of anger and shame, thus enfeebling their people even more. In short, these rulers eternalize their people's affliction, even as they try to eternalize their own grip on power.

Since medieval times in Europe, and more recently in the Middle East as well, Jews (read Israel) have been the favourite scapegoat of oppressive and scheming rulers.

The treatment of former Palestinians living in Syria fleeing the slaughter there offers up merely the latest example of the use of this particularly despicable but reliable tactic.

Last week, Jordanian Prime Minister Abdullah Ensour told the world that his country will no longer allow Palestinian refugees to find sanctuary in his country.

This was an abrupt change of policy for the Hashemite Kingdom, for, since the Syrian civil war erupted some 22 months ago, Jordan had indeed taken in Palestinians among the more than 125,000 men, women and children who have fled Syria for Jordan. The Palestinians, however, most from the Yarmuk refugee camp south of Damascus, have been segregated in a separate refugee camp.

According to the Times of Israel, they are banned from entering Jordanian cities.

Now, however, the Jordanian government is turning them away.

The reason is obvious.

More than half of the people who live in Jordan are former Palestinians. The government fears adding to their numbers, especially ahead of the emotion and foment of general elections that are scheduled for Jan. 23.

In addition, of course, it is expensive to receive, shelter, protect and provide sustenance to thousands of individuals. The harsh, raw weather last week has made the task even more difficult. But, rather than speak the truth, Ensour scapegoated the Jews as the reason his government shut the door on the Palestinians.

"There are those who want to absolve Israel once again of its responsibility for banishing Palestinians from their homes," Ensour told the London-based Arab daily al-Hayat. "Jordan is not the place to solve Israel's problems. Jordan has taken a sovereign and explicit decision not to allow Palestinians carrying Syrian [travel] documents to enter Jordan. Receiving these brethren is a red line for us, because it will be a prelude for another wave of deportation, which is what the Israeli government wants."

In pointing his accusing finger at the State of Israel, Ensour dismissively contradicted and covered over the more truthful tracks of a Jordanian government spokesperson, Samih Maaytah, who had offered a different explanation merely one day earlier for his government's policy.

"Jordan is not obligated to pay a political price for the Syrian crisis," Maaytah told Al-Jazeera. "Jordan does not prevent the return of its citizens... but the transfer of Palestinian refugees from Syria to Jordan is a matter of tens of thousands, something Jordan cannot bear."

Ensour's polemical prevarication harkened back to a recent, equally objectionable example by Jordanian authorities of pointing at the Jewish "other" to explain the victimization of the Palestinians.

Last autumn, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian refugees (UNRWA) floated a trial balloon that it was considering adding some teaching segments about the Holocaust in an upgraded curriculum on conflict resolution for Palestinian children in its schools in refugee camps.

The executive committee of UNRWA teachers in Jordan reacted with revulsion. "We condemn this decision, which equates the butcher and the victim," the committee wrote in a statement.

In quickly rejecting the possibility last fall, the teachers echoed a similarly worded rejection by their colleagues a year earlier.

"Teaching UNRWA students about the so-called 'Holocaust' as part of human rights harms the Palestinian cause... and changes the students' views regarding their main enemy, namely the Israeli occupation."

Ensour and these teachers scapegoated Israel. The Palestinians' predicament is the fault of the Jews, they say. Many Palestinians believe them. And many others do, too.

Thus, shackled so entirely and so debilitatingly to the destructive forces of hatred and vengefulness by longstanding falsehoods about the Jews, the Palestinians are unable to break through and build their own country. –MBD

Vatican denounces radical bishop's comments

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Vatican has denounced comments by the leader of a traditionalist Catholic organization who told an Ontario school audience that Jews are "enemies of the Church."

At the same time, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) stated that the "outrageous" comments were not representative of the larger Roman Catholic Church.

The remarks that drew international attention were delivered by Bishop Bernard Fellay, superior general of the Society of St. Piux X (SSPX), a group that was founded in 1970 in reaction to the church's efforts to modernize.

In a Dec. 28 address to Our Lady of Mount Carmel Academy in New Hamburg, Ont., the Swiss-born cleric listed Jews, along with "Masons and modernists" as enemies of the church who opposed Vatican recognition of the SSPX. He also said support by Jewish leaders for the Second Vatican Council "shows that Vatican II is their thing, not the church's."

A recording of his nearly two-hour address, which largely focused on relations with the Vatican, was posted on YouTube.

The church quickly rejected the bishop's assertions. According to a report by the Catholic News Service, Vatican spokesman Father Federico Lombardi said, "It is absolutely unacceptable, impossible, to define the Jews as enemies of the church." The church, he added, remains committed to deepening relations with the Jewish People.

In the United States, the SSPX's U.S. district published a news release attempting to explain the bishop's anti-Jewish comments.

"The word 'enemies' used here by Bishop Fellay is of course a religious concept and refers to any group or religious sect which opposed the mission of the Catholic Church and her efforts to fulfil it: salvation of souls," it said. "By referring to the Jews, Bishop Fellay's comment was aimed at the leaders of Jewish organizations, and not the Jewish People, as is being implied by journalists.

"Accordingly, the Society of St. Pius X denounces the repeated false accusations of antisemitism or hate speech made in an attempt to silence its message."

In Toronto, CIJA chair David Koschitzky downplayed the significance of the bishop's statements.

"As outrageous as they are, Bishop Fellay's antisemitic comments reflect no more than a very small group within the church that has been pushed to the margins by the vast majority of Catholics. In fact, recent decades have seen unprecedented Jewish-Catholic co-operation and understanding, particularly as Catholic leaders have increasingly appreciated the Jewish roots of Christianity. That Bishop Fellay's disgusting remarks come at a time of such goodwill between our communities is a slap in the face to Jews and Catholics alike."

Father Raymond de Souza, a member of CIJA's board, pointed to the "very good relations between Catholics and Jews" as exemplified by the two visits to Israel by Pope John Paul II and Pope Benedict.

"These comments come from a splinter group that is not in full communion with the Holy See and reflect one of the reasons why there is tension between them and the Holy See. While the speech was given in Canada, the SSPX is very marginal in the life of the Catholic community in Canada. Neither Catholics nor Jews should be concerned that their views will have any resonance."

Bishop Fellay's remarks were not the first by SSPX spokespeople that have stirred controversy. The group's founder, Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre, wrote to Pope John Paul II in 1985 saying, "Jews, Communists and Freemasons" were the church's contemporary enemies, while Bishop Richard Williamson has denied the Nazis used gas chambers and claimed no more than 300,000 Jews were killed during World War II.

Late last week, CIJA sent a letter to the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, asking the group to repudiate Bishop Fellay's remarks. The conference had not responded by The CJN's deadline.

Arrest made in subway fraud scheme

Israeli alleged to have targeted Jews in Toronto

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Police have arrested an Israeli man who allegedly defrauded Jewish subway commuters of sums ranging from $40 to $1,000.

Israel Aharonovitz, 63, was arrested Jan. 9 at the Glencairn subway station after police witnessed him approaching three women asking for money to help him out of a financial dilemma.

Police allege he targeted Jewish women and men by appealing to their religious convictions and telling them they would be performing "a mitzvah," or fulfilling a religious duty, by giving him the money.

"The premise he uses is the mitzvah. He preys on the religious aspect of people. He guilts them," said Det. James Turnbull of Toronto Police Service.

Turnbull said Aharonovitz would approach passengers between the Lawrence West and Eglinton West stations, start a conversation and tell them a story about a sick wife who was in need of medication. He would ask for directions to the hospital and tell them he couldn't convert his shekels or that his bank card wouldn't work in Toronto.

He told them he owned a restaurant in Israel and would treat them to a meal when they visited, and he told them any money they gave him would be a loan and would be repaid.

He would then accompany his victims to an ATM machine at their stop, where they withdrew the money, Turnbull alleged.

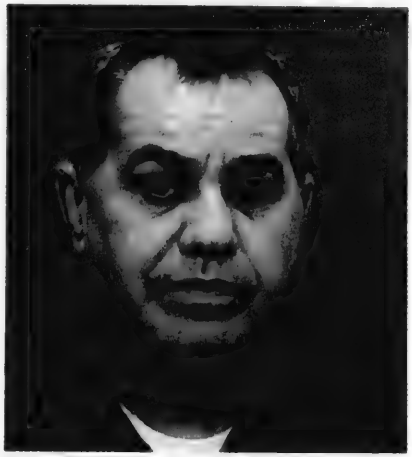
Aharanovitz allegedly focused on women aged 20 to 30. Toronto Police Service issued a news release last week asking for information about the alleged perpetrator. That led to "good results," Turnbull said, including four men who came forward saying they, too, had been approached by him.

Police learned the frauds generally took place between 9 a.m. and noon. "I went out at 10 to see what we can see," Turnbull said.

He soon spotted Aharanovitz and trailed him for a time on subways, seeing him approach three women, who all rebuffed him. Shortly afterward, he made the arrest.

Immigration authorities were informed. Police allege Aharonovitz was in Canada illegally, Turnbull said.

He was charged with four counts of fraud under $5,000. Police believe there may be more victims. Anyone with information is asked to contact police at 416-808-1300, or to call Crimestoppers at 416-222-TIPS (8477), go online at www.222tips.com, or text TOR and leave a message to CRIMES (274637).



Israel Aharonovitz is charged with four counts of fraud.

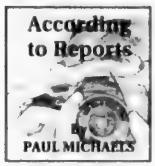
Israelis favour peace, but think it can't happen

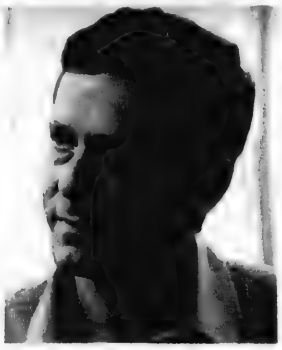
Last month, in a Globe and Mail column titled "Netanyahu's in – his drama's on the right," Shira Herzog provided readers with solid insights into the Jan. 22 Israeli election.

Numerous polls indicate that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, whose Likud party has formed an alliance with Yisrael Beiteinu to form Likud-Beiteinu, is heavily favoured to win. The question is what sort of coalition arrangement would result, given the strong rise, to Netanyahu's right, of Naftali Bennett's religious-nationalist "Jewish Home" party.



Herzog referred to "the pervasive swing to the right in the country's political discourse, which mirrors public attitudes that have deepened over the past decade." But she immediately added the essential context for this shift: "Scarred by the bloody Palestinian intifadah of 2000, wars in Lebanon and Hamas-dominated Gaza and ongoing rocket attacks, Israelis have little appetite for an agreement with the Palestinians, even though, in principle, they support the notion of two states."

Israelis have indeed reacted to the hostility and rejectionism they have encountered for many years and continue to see on virtually every front. Still, it's important to note that Israelis have not moved to the right. Rather, some of the key conservative parties have shifted further right.



Isaac Herzog

Although Herzog stated that Israelis have "little appetite" for an agreement with the Palestinians, it's perhaps more apt to say that Israelis have "little faith" that such an agreement is even possible at this time. In an interview with Gil Hoffman (in the Dec. 31 Jerusalem Report), Isaac Herzog, second on the Labor party list, discussed the necessity of trying to reach an agreement with the Palestinians. However, Herzog added: "A lot depends on the issue of trust, and currently there isn't any. The Palestinians earned their lack of trust. Abbas is a tough partner. Israel should expose him."

That observation is key, since much reporting and commentary on this subject simply assumes that if only Israel makes the expected gestures, the Palestinians would readily say yes to a deal. Sadly, the facts show otherwise.

Despite their pessimism about the feasibility of a peace agreement, Israelis still support in principle the idea of a two-state solution, as Herzog noted.

Opinion surveys confirm this trend. For instance, as reported in the Jerusalem Post in December, a Smith Research poll showed that "58 per cent of Israelis would prefer to see Israel remain as a Jewish, democratic state through fixed state borders along the route of the West Bank security barrier, seeing Israel preserve its character alongside a demilitarized Palestinian state." Significantly, 78 per cent are concerned that Israel could become a binational state, putting its Jewish and democratic character at risk. The Post also reported a finding by the Israel Democracy Institute that 58 per cent of Israelis don't believe that a two-state solution will end the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians.

A poll conducted by New Wave Research this month for Israel Hayom, a paper that backs Netanyahu, matches the above-cited results quite closely: 54 per cent favour a two-state solution while 38 per cent oppose the idea. However, 54 per cent say the two-state solution isn't feasible. According to New Wave, Israelis are evenly divided (43 per cent pro to 43 per cent con) on the question of whether, for the sake of engendering talks with the Palestinians, Israel should halt building homes in the West Bank.

In a nutshell, this captures Israel's predicament. A clear majority supports a two-state solution, while at the same time (and by the same margin) Israelis fear it cannot be achieved due to the absence of a committed Palestinian partner.

Polling firms often report that a majority of Palestinians also support a two-state solution, despite some erosion in favour of one state. Still, unless the pollsters ask the Palestinians who say they support "two states" whether they're willing to confine a "right of return" only to a Palestinian state, this finding is misleading. Unfortunately, pollsters rarely, if ever, ask these two questions together – and thus overlook the core rejectionism that plagues Palestinian nationalism.

Perpetual dilemma

Next week, on Jan. 22, Israelis go to the polls to elect the members of the next Knesset from among whom their next government will be formed.

As ever, they have a wide-ranging, left-to-right, secular-to-observant, narrowly ethnic to widely inclusive, single-issue to multi-issue, new-faces and old-faces constellation of competing parties from which to choose.

And as ever, the key issue facing Israelis is their security: physical and economic.

The economic security choices they face fall very much along lines familiar to voters in Canada, and indeed in the entire western world. More or less, we make those decisions according to our personal understanding of the appropriate role of government in a free market.

However, the physical security choices Israeli voters face are unlike any Canadians, Americans or other westerners confront: how to find a way to live in peace with all of its neighbours?

Unfortunately, it has been thus for Israeli voters since their very first election after the state was founded in 1948. No other country in the United Nations must still diplomatically and militarily defend its very right to exist against the malevolent efforts of some fellow UN members to "wipe it off the face of the earth."

From our vantage point, in the comfort and safety of our Canadian homes, we can only hope that Israelis will elect a parliament and choose a government that will make every reasonable effort to reach a treaty of peace with the Palestinians. And we would even hope that the definition of reasonable efforts would include new, bold, imaginative, fresh-thinking, daring steps to find common ground with the Palestinians. It is our view, and most recent polls in Israel confirm, that the majority of Israelis share this hope.

But it is also our view, and most recent polls in Israel confirm, that reasonable efforts do not include patently reckless and self-destructive steps.

In the current circumstances, however, it would be difficult to convince most Israelis that the Palestinian leadership truly wishes to make peace with the Jewish state.

The rulers of Gaza are ideologically, theocratically and politically sworn to annihilate Israel. And the rulers of the West Bank prevaricate at every opportunity, suggesting at the United Nations and to visiting western leaders a willingness to negotiate with Israel, but exhorting their people to the "fulfilment of the dream of return" and "ending the occupation" when western microphones are turned off (Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Jan. 4, on the anniversary of Fatah's founding).

As Paul Michaels astutely summarizes in his column this week, "A clear majority [of Israelis] supports a two-state solution while at the same time Israelis fear it cannot be achieved due to the absence of a committed Palestinian partner."

It is the perpetual dilemma for the Israeli electorate.

We hope and pray they choose wisely.

Toronto-area Liberal MP Roland de Corneille urged Ottawa to call for moderation by all sides in the ongoing violence in the West Bank and Gaza. The Eglinton-Lawrence MP said the conflict was the result of both sides being unable to take needed steps to start peaceful negotiations.

Skeptical of church's support for Israel

Ever since Rev. Alfred C. Forrest was moderator of the United Church more than 60 years ago, that church has assumed blatantly anti-Israeli policies ("United Church not against Israel, says official," Dec. 13). Back then, it claimed that the Jews had stolen Arab land on which to create their state. Today that position continues based on the so-called illegal Israeli settlements in the traditional heartland of the Jewish people – Judea and Samaria – that was liberated from Jordanian control in 1967. Both charges are patently false, as any objective analysis proves.

Yet Rev. Bruce Gregersen disingenuously maintains that the United Church is the only mainstream church that has affirmed Israel as a Jewish state and that "supports the existence, safety and thriving of Israel." Unfortunately, such United Church policies as support for east Jerusalem as the future capital of yet another Arab state and the relocation in Israel of millions of voluntary Arab refugees and their descendants of 1947-49 seriously question the United Church's sincerity in affirming Israel as a Jewish state. As well, one has to view with extreme skepticism the church's support for the existence, safety and thriving of Israel when it turns a blind eye both to persistent Islamic hatred, vilification and terrorism directed against Jews and Israel and the international divestment boycott and sanctions movement against Israel.

Building Jewish homes

What is The CJN's policy regarding letters of the editor? Can incorrect information be printed with nary a note from the editor? Smadar Meiri, in her letter "Settlement construction" (Jan. 3), incorrectly states that Israel is committed to freeze all building of Jewish homes in Judea and Samaria, including for natural growth, while having negotiations with the Palestinian Authority. This is absolutely incorrect. I hope that in the future, The CJN does not allow its letters section to be used as a vehicle for anti-Israel propaganda.

Rockets threaten peace talks

Letter writer Smadar Meiri is critical of Israel's policies with regard to settlement construction ("Settlement construction" Jan. 3). She believes these policies are in contravention of UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 1515. She has, apparently, not read the part of Resolution 242 that calls for "every state in the area to live in peace within secure and recognized borders free from threats and acts of violence." As well, she may have overlooked the part of Resolution 1515 that calls for "the cessation of all acts of violence, all acts of terrorism and the dismantling of the terrorist infrastructures."

Rockets raining onto Israel from the Palestinian terrorist group Hamas are a much graver threat to peace talks – which the Palestinians refuse to attend, despite the pleadings to do so of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and others – than a democratic Jewish state planning to build a few dozen dwellings in disputed territories, the ownership of which is to be resolved in direct negotiation between the two parties.

West Bank construction

Settlements do impede peace, contrary to what Steven Scheffer says in his letter to the editor, "Settlements don't impede peace" (Dec. 20). Punishing Palestinians for going to the United Nations for non-member observer status is not in peace's best interest. The Israeli government's announcing intentions to build more Israeli housing in the West Bank was clearly punishment.

Unfortunately, the Hamas leadership improved its credibility within the Palestinian community when it resisted Israel military might recently and forced at least indirect negotiations with western powers and a partial easing of the naval blockade of Gaza.

Yes, antisemitism exists in the Middle East, and most Palestinians would prefer to control all of the land between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea, but antisemitism will not be eradicated by "crushing it at its source," as Scheffer says. The Israeli government needs to demonstrate through its actions that a Jewish homeland in the Middle East can be a "win-win" situation for the region. There are many Israelis and progressive Zionists who are working toward a secure, democratic and prosperous Israel and Palestine.

Protecting Roma refugees: a unique perspective

Gina Csanyi-Robah

On Sept. 25, 2006, seven days after arriving as an intern at the European Roma Rights Centre in Budapest, Hungary, I was given an opportunity to attend a roundtable discussion at the Central European University hosted by the Canadian government and the former Canadian ambassador to Hungary, Robert Hage. The purpose was to assess the social situation for Roma in Hungary. Prior to attending the meeting, I was informed that it was in fact an inquiry into whether Canada could again remove its travel visa restriction for Hungarians. Within an hour of being in the university in downtown Budapest, surrounded by Canadian government representatives, Hungarian academics, representatives of various human rights and social justice NGOs, and a scattering of Roma intellectuals and activists, I realized that I was in a very unique position. I was the sole Canadian-born, Hungarian Roma in the room.

In the day of presentations and discussions that followed, it became abundantly clear to Hage that the majority of Hungary's Roma live in dreadful conditions and have genuine reasons for seeking a more hopeful existence in Canada, as thousands had done between 1997 and 2001, when a visa was not required to travel to Canada. The Canadians heard details of the deeply embedded systemic discrimination in Hungary that section 51-53 of the Geneva Convention Handbook of refugee determination describes as equivalent to persecution. Hungarian lawyer Lila Farkas, founder of the Chance for Children Foundation, described the serious problem of endemic racism, poverty, segregated and substandard schooling, and systematic placement in special-needs schools that has resulted in 50 per cent of Roma children in Hungary not achieving more than a primary education.

It would take three years and mounting pressure from the European Union for Canada to finally remove the visa requirement in 2009. In the meantime, things continued to worsen in Hungary, with a deteriorating economy and the rapid rise of the far-right nationalist movement. The Fidesz political party took power in the 2007, and a steady move toward fascism and centralization of power in the government began.

Even more menacing was the birth of Jobbik, Hungary's third-most-powerful political party, which proclaims that Hungary is for true Hungarians, while confidently declaring itself to be anti-Roma and antisemitic. Jobbik maintains a stronghold in northeastern Hungary, where the majority of Hungarian Roma live and where Jobbik's 47 members of Parliament and four members of European Parliament come from. This is where Miskolcs, Hungary's second-largest city, is located and where the vast majority of Roma refugee claims originate.

It's widely acknowledged that Jobbik and its paramilitary wing, the Hungarian Guards, have modelled themselves on Hitler's Nazi Party. Jobbik's power and organization make Greece's Golden Dawn party look amateurish. But the systemic discrimination that Roma face in Hungary pales in comparison to the direct threat posed by the Jobbik party. Its entire political platform is based on the vilification, demonization and dehumanization of Hungary's Roma population.

On Oct. 30, 2011, one year after I became executive director of Canada's sole Roma organization, Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney visited the Roma Community Centre in Toronto. Once again, I realized that I was in a very unique position. I was the sole Canadian-born Hungarian Roma in the room. In addition to preparing a complete information package with reports from Amnesty International, I arranged for Kenney to meet a roomful of people that included some notable human rights and social justice activists, as well as settlement workers who have helped countless Roma families and Roma refugee claimants.

I carefully explained the situation in Hungary and included details of the serial murder spree between 2008 and 2009 that left eight Roma dead and 48 injured for life, which became a huge catalyst for Roma to flee to Canada in 2009. Unfortunately, the Canadian public has never heard of the small yet significant number of Roma refugees from Hungary who are politicians, engineers, journalists, teachers, and police officers. Talk of bogus refugees, organized crime, taking advantage of social benefits, and safe democratic European countries has drowned out the truth that people ought to know.

In the past decade, at least 1,000 Roma families have been acknowledged and accepted as genuine refugees in Canada by the Immigration and Refugee Board. Kenney also heard first-hand accounts of human rights abuses, terror and racially motivated violence that these Roma families had been subjected to from every sector of Hungarian society, including police and the Jobbik party.

Last May, refugee lawyer Maureen Silcoff and I testified together in Ottawa before a parliamentary committee on immigration and citizenship regarding Bill C-31, now called Protecting Canada's Immigration and Refugee System Act. Once again, I found myself in a unique position as being the first Romani person in Canadian history to testify to the federal government. On June 18, I returned to Ottawa to present to a Senate committee. On both occasions, I also submitted a brief to explain in more detail some of the factors leading to Roma seeking asylum in Canada, as well as the contributing factors as to why there have been a significant number of withdrawn refugee claims. Lack of first-language support, few skills to navigate the complex refugee-determination system, fear and mistrust of institutions, feeling unwelcomed by the government, and negligent legal advice and representation by immigration consultants and a small number of lawyers were the main reasons for withdrawn refugee claims.

Despite our best efforts, Kenney did not reconsider the creation of a safe countries list, nor did he make an amendment to the legislation to include an independent panel of experts that would designate countries as either safe or unsafe. Kenney centralized all discretionary power in his office to designate countries as being either being safe or unsafe.

On July 1, Bill C-31 became law. More recently, on Dec. 14, Kenney announced the "designated countries of origin list"(DCO), which includes 27 countries, of which 25 are member states of the European Union. In addition to all refugee claimants from DCO countries being denied access to basic health care, they are now being discouraged from coming to Canada to seek asylum by the threat of detainment and being subjected to a system where they're set up to fail because of drastically reduced timelines that do not provide an opportunity to secure counsel and submit a strong, well-substantiated refugee claim. In addition, failed claimants are sent back faster with no opportunity to appeal or to access a judicial review of their case or a pre-removal risk assessment for at least 12 months after being rejected.

Gina Csanyi-Robah

In preparations for the struggle to help Roma refugee claimants at the Roma Community Centre, we are working with our community partners and multifaith religious institutions to help secure sanctuary for families with extremely compelling refugee claims who have been rejected. We're also applying for funding to run our in-house legal clinic for one full day, as well as seeking sources of medical care and engaging in ongoing advocacy and public education to raise awareness about the conditions that compel Roma to seek refuge here.

Who are our allies in this battle to access justice for Roma refugees? Some are community workers, social justice advocates, students, teachers, academics, lawyers, doctors, politicians, and concerned citizens. Many of those working closest with us are Jewish. Many of us feel strongly that Jews and Roma have an intimate connection from being Europe's undesirables for centuries leading up to the shared experience of extermination during the Holocaust. Countless members of the Roma Community Centre, as well as Roma refugee claimants, lost relatives or entire families prior to and during World War II. My great aunt was a survivor. I have interviewed a survivor and attended her funeral. I have cried with those who were orphaned. There is a mutual feeling of comfort, safety and understanding that we Roma and Jews feel for each other. We have come to each other's aid in our times of need in the past, and, thankfully, I have learned that our hands and hearts are still there now.

Gina Csanyi-Robah is the Canadian Roma community's chief spokesperson and executive director of the Toronto Roma Community Centre.

Les Misérables and the Jewish problem

I know what you're thinking. You saw Les Misérables. You loved the play, adored the movie. You don't remember any Jewish characters and you're thinking, "Please don't ruin it for me by saying it's antisemitic."

Of course, you're right. There are no Jewish characters – none of the unsavoury stock figures of European literature, such as Shakespeare's Shylock or Charles Dickens' Fagin. But as I left the movie theatre, I turned to my husband and said, "This is about the Jews."

I immediately thought about the joke recounted by author Hugh Nissenson to explain the title of his collection of short stories, The Elephant and My Jewish Problem. Nissenson wrote:

"The zoology class is assigned a paper on the elephant. The Englishman writes 'Hunting the Elephant.' The Frenchman, 'The Love Life of the Elephant.' The Jewish student turns in a paper, 'The Elephant and the Jewish Problem.'" Her husband, Nissenson's wife noted, was "like the Jewish zoology student."

With a nod toward Nissenson as a kindred spirit and an apology to those of you who don't want Les Mis mucked up with discussions of theology, history and literature, I'm going to elaborate on how the Jewish problem for Christiandom shapes this work.

Even without Jewish characters, Les Misérables – both the contemporary musical and the 19th-century novel by Victor Hugo on which it is based – speak to the place of the Jew in European Christian thought.

As most of you know, the story revolves around the struggle between Jean Valjean and Inspector Javert. Valjean, a rough ex-convict, undergoes a conversion experience after he steals silver goods from a kindly bishop who has given him food and shelter. Although he is apprehended, Valjean is set free when the bishop lies on his behalf, claiming the silver was a gift.

Experiencing unmerited mercy, Valjean feels the force of God in the world and commits himself to acts of goodness. Successful in business, he gives alms generously, has compassion for the oppressed and even adopts the orphaned daughter of an unwed mother turned prostitute. But because Valjean has broken parole, he is pursued by Javert, who wants to enforce the law and return Valjean to prison. As the action progresses, Valjean comes to be associated with the principle of "mercy" and Javert with "law."

At a pivotal moment, Valjean has the opportunity to kill his nemesis. Instead, he helps him escape from the revolutionaries. Confounded by this unexpected act of mercy, Javert later finds himself unable to capture Valjean. His faith in law has been shaken by an act of unexpected kindness, just as Valjean's had been years earlier. But while Valjean opened his heart to God, Javert is torn between what he views as two incompatible principles: mercy and law. To espouse mercy, he must reject law. To maintain law, he must reject mercy. Deeply shaken, he kills himself.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Although Javert cannot bring them together, in the Jewish tradition, law and mercy coexist – both as attributes of the Jewish concept of God, and as human ideals. But Christian theology claims for itself the governing principle of mercy, assigning to Judaism unbending law. In supplanting Judaism, according to this view, Christianity replaced the harsh rule of law with mercy. In the philosophical underpinnings of Les Misérables, Valjean represents Christianity – spreading goodness through acts of kindness, whether merited or not. This association is heightened, as my husband pointed out to me, by Valjean conforming to the Christian ideal: he remains celibate.

Javert represents a Christian idea of Judaism – a system of principles that, while not evil (as Valjean acknowledges of Javert), is limited and cannot address human suffering. Javert has no way out of his conflict, then, because he cannot be both "Jewish" and "Christian" at the same time. Or, to put it differently, once the "Jew" discovers mercy, he becomes "Christian."

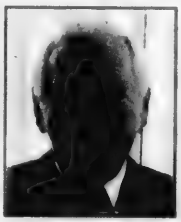
I'm not suggesting that Victor Hugo was antisemitic. To the contrary, a republican and a deist, he favored religious equality. He saw Jews as unjustly oppressed, and criticized the pogroms in Russia. At the same time, he absorbed the religious teachings of his Catholic childhood, and they form the scaffolding of his worldview.

The Jewish connection struck me because the film's promise of afterlife joy contradicts its this-worldly revolutionary politics. And because that's what Jewish Studies professors do.

Israel after the election

It's still generally assumed, though increasingly uncertain, that Benjamin Netanyahu will continue as the prime minister of Israel after next Tuesday's election, but the composition of his government may change drastically. It's even possible that, contrary to what has become the norm, he or a rival could form a viable coalition without the participation of haredi political parties.

This is because in the course of the current election campaign, contending parties, some of them new, have hinted, albeit ambiguously and erratically, at the possibility of serving under Netanyahu. They could replace traditional haredi partners who in the past have tended to support the prime minister in matters of foreign and domestic policy in lieu of special concessions for their institutions and adherents.



Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Hiddush (renewal) describes itself as a trans-denominational non-profit organization outside party politics that seeks to act as a bridge between Israel and the Diaspora. It aims to promote religious freedom and equality in the Jewish state. Those who've endorsed Hiddush include Charles Bronfman, the Canadian businessman and philanthropist; Prof. Alan Dershowitz, one of the best-known and most articulate advocates of Israel in the United States, and the distinguished Israeli writer Amos Oz.

The latest Hiddush-sponsored opinion poll, published at the end of last year in anticipation of the election, indicates that tensions between secular and haredi Jews in Israel are seen by the public as greatly surpassing other domestic issues.

Some 71 per cent of Israelis view it as the most or the second-most acute problem the country is facing, compared to 41 per cent who put the strife between the political right and left high up on their list, 33 per cent who see the rift between rich and poor as critical and 16 per cent who view the traditional divide between Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews as the most troublesome aspect of Israeli internal politics.

Stanley Gold, the Los Angeles-based American businessman and Jewish leader who chairs the board of Hiddush, and its president, Rabbi Uri Regev, the well-known Israeli human rights advocate and former president of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, write: "Even though the Iranian threat seems to shadow the elections, the issue most prevalent in Israeli society, adversely impacting Israel's economy, security, gender equality, religious freedom and human dignity, is the worsening conflict between religion and state and between the secular and the ultra-Orthodox."

Many in the Diaspora may find this uncomfortable, because they believe themselves to be defending Israel's international standing by uncritically supporting all the policies of its government. The situation described by Hiddush challenges the acquiescence that likes to heed statements by Israeli politicians in power who argue that although the widening religious gap may be serious, in view of Israel's other problems, it's not urgent.

But things may be changing. A growing number of Israelis have come to realize that the existence of a large and economically unproductive population that depends on state handouts for its survival can no longer be tolerated. Nor can discrimination against women by haredim be accepted. Not to have access to government resources via the ballot box may force them to rethink their position.

Virtually all Jews outside Israel live in countries where religious freedom and gender equality prevail, and they're the beneficiaries. It's therefore reasonable to assume that ultimately they won't support such discrimination in the Jewish state. Jews in the Diaspora, irrespective of religious affiliation, work for a living without massive dependence on the state. They may expect something similar in Israel. The involvement of prominent Diaspora leaders in Hiddush points in that direction.

And there're reasons to believe that the non-Orthodox majority in Israel won't wish to live indefinitely with the status quo. This, in turn, may enable the next prime minister to form a government without the support of the entrenched Orthodox establishment.

Such a move would greatly stimulate economic growth. At present, some 900,000 Israeli children live below the poverty line. Many of them come from large haredi families where fathers spend time allegedly studying Torah and living off welfare while mothers are too burdened by childbirth and childcare to work outside the home.

In the Diaspora, on the other hand, even haredi Jews have to a very large extent accommodated themselves to the economic realities of the countries in which they reside. Most earn a living that provides for their families. They may serve as role models for their Israeli counterparts.

Election campaign emphasized security issues

With Israel's Jan. 22 general election less than a week away, the stars seem aligned in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's favour. Nearly four years after cobbling together a right-wing government, he seems poised to regain the premiership. Polls suggest that the right-wing bloc, spearheaded by Netanyahu and his partner, Avigdor Lieberman of the Yisrael Beiteinu party, will most likely defeat the forces of the centre-left.

In the 2009 election, Netanyahu's Likud party won 27 Knesset seats, one less than the centrist Kadima party, then led by Tzipi Livni, the former foreign minister. But after she failed to form a government, Netanyahu stepped in and assembled a workable coalition in league with secular and religious allies.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The center-left bloc – consisting of Shelly Yachimovich's Labor party, Livni's Hatnua party, Yair Lapid's Yesh Atid party and Shaul Mofaz's Kadima party – will probably not win enough seats to topple Netanyahu and company. Still, Yachimovich and Livni have both called for a united centrist front to counter the right. It probably will not come to pass. Personal rivalries, as well as Lapid's announcement that he may yet serve in a government led by Netanyahu, have diminished the chances of a centrist union.

Judging by surveys, the centre-left will at best amass 54 seats, leaving the balance of power in the hands of Yisrael Beiteinu and another rightist party, Shas, which are in Netanyahu's camp.

Last October, pundits predicted that the newly formed Likud-Yisrael Beiteinu list would win 47 parliamentary seats. But since Lieberman was indicted on corruption charges and forced to step down as foreign minister, the list has lost some of its lustre. Pollsters now claim the pair will pick up as few as 32 seats.

There is a wild card in this equation. Thirty-one per cent of voters appear to be undecided. A significant number of them are centrists, a constituency that could affect the outcome of the election.

Nevertheless, Netanyahu is best positioned to win a second consecutive term, notwithstanding his recent warning that the centre-left bloc may somehow overtake him.

Despite his ideological predispositions, Netanyahu may yet decide to establish a pragmatic, politically broader government, in which case he will look to the centre. It would not be an unprecedented occurrence. Last spring, Netanyahu formed a short-lived alliance with Mofaz, Livni's successor as leader of the Kadima party, which was established by Ariel Sharon after he left the Likud in 2005.

Within two months, the Netanyahu-Mofaz partnership unravelled over a disagreement regarding the enrolment of haredi yeshiva students in the armed forces.

Realistically, in light of recent developments in the Likud, Netanyahu is not likely to try to create a centre-right government. Last November, Likud unveiled a strong right-wing slate of candidates for the 19th Knesset, dropping moderates and elevating hardliners in preparation for the election.

Likud moderates such as Dan Meridor and Michael Eitan were assigned slots that do not guarantee them seats in the Knesset. By contrast, far rightists like Danny Danon, Yisrael Katz and Moshe Feiglin won "realistic" slots.

Likud's further drift to the right – a development that mirrors Israel's rightward lurch since the Six Day War, the Oslo peace process and the second Palestinian uprising – was also embodied in a recommendation made by Public Diplomacy Minister Yuli Edelstein. He urged the government to annex Area C, the site of Israeli settlements in the West Bank.

Further evidence of Israel's movement toward the right will manifest itself should a victorious Netanyahu invite Naftali Bennett's ultra-nationalist Jewish Home party into his coalition. As of this week, Bennett's party was expected to win upward of 18 seats.

Although many Israelis are focused on socioeconomic matters, this election campaign has turned mainly on security and diplomatic issues, as in in the past.

Netanyahu has taken credit for maintaining a robust economy during a global recession, but he has largely dwelled on conflict management problems.

First and foremost, he has spoken of his role in convincing the international community to curb Iran's budding nuclear program. Beyond Iran, he has talked about preserving Israel's peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan, deterring Hamas in an eight-day border war, expanding the coverage of the Iron Dome anti-missile system and building a security fence along the Egyptian border.

He claims he supports the establishment of a demilitarized Palestinian state, provided the Palestinians recognize Israel as a Jewish state and agree to end the conflict. By the same token, he has promised to strengthen Jewish settlements in the West Bank and cautioned against rushing into an agreement with the Palestinian Authority.

Netanyahu's commitment to Palestinian statehood has been sharply questioned by two important Likud stalwarts. Gideon Saar, the education minister, has declared that Netanyahu's formula of "two states for two peoples," enunciated in a Bar-Ilan University speech in June 2009, was never part of Likud's election platform. Meanwhile, backbencher Tzipi Hotovely has described Netanyahu's speech as merely a tactical manoeuvre to placate the United States.

Hotovely's revealing comment has been seconded by Yuval Diskin, the former director of the Shin Bet, and by Livni. Diskin has accused Netanyahu of insincerity in endorsing Palestinian statehood, while Livni has observed, "Today, the whole world knows that this speech was just lip service, a mask for moderation on an extremist face."

Shaul Mofaz

Mofaz, the former defence minister, has been just as critical. Claiming that Netanyahu is far too focused on Iran, at the expense of reaching an agreement with the Palestinians, he has warned that Israel may well morph into a binational state unless the Palestinian issue is settled. In a reference to the demographic threat facing Israel, he observed, "In a few years, we will no longer have a Jewish majority, and we will become South Africa of the previous century."

Yachimovitch has concentrated on socioeconomic issues, but she has called for an immediate renewal of talks with the Palestinians on the basis of the Clinton parameters, which were accepted with reservations by Israel and the Palestinian Authority in 2000. These guidelines, drawn up by the Clinton administration, envision a Palestinian state in about 95 per cent of the West Bank and in all of the Gaza Strip.

Tzipi Livni

The Clinton parameters surfaced when Ehud Barak, the then Labor party leader, was Israel's prime minister. Defeated in the 2001 election, Barak eventually joined Netanyahu's government as defence minister. In 2011, he left the Labor party and formed the Independence party. Although he still holds his job, Barak recently disclosed he would not run for re-election. Whether he stays on as defence minister in a Netanyahu cabinet remains to be seen.

Exhibit highlights Wallenberg's humanitarianism

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

When Swedish businessman and diplomat Raoul Wallenberg arrived in Budapest on July 9, 1944, more than 435,000 Jews had already been deported to the Auschwitz extermination camp in Poland by Adolf Eichmann, the architect of the Holocaust in Hungary.

With the Nazis dead set on murdering the 230,000 Jews still left in the Hungarian capital, Wallenberg, the scion of a distinguished mercantile family, was equally determined to save them.

Dispatched to German-occupied Hungary by the War Refugee Board, an agency created by U.S. President Franklin Roosevelt to help civilian victims of Nazi oppression, Wallenberg set out to protect Hungary's Jews last remaining Jews as World War II wound down.

Through a combination of cunning, resourcefulness and courage, Wallenberg was able to achieve his objective. He printed protective passports and purchased safe houses, thereby plucking tens of thousands of Jews from the jaws of death.

In January 1945, he was arrested by the invading Red Army, never to be seen again. Later, the Soviet Union claimed he had died in a prison in 1947.

Had he lived, Wallenberg, a hero and an icon, would have turned 100 in 2012.

Wallenberg's life and humanitarian achievements are being marked by the Toronto Reference Library (789 Yonge St.) in an 11-day exhibition open to the public that began Jan. 12.

The exhibition, titled To me there's no other choice – Raoul Wallenberg 1912-2012, was created by the Swedish Institute in partnership with the Living History Forum.

The Swedish Institute, a government organization, is dedicated to promoting Swedish interests abroad, while the Living History Forum, a Swedish public institution, promotes tolerance, democracy and human rights.

The exhibition comes to Toronto after stops in New York City, Washington, D.C., Berlin, Geneva and Ottawa, and is divided into three distinct parts: his childhood, his efforts to assist imperiled Hungarian Jews and his interactions with Jews in Budapest.

Commenting on the exhibition, Teppo Tauriainen, Sweden's ambassador to Canada, said, "I hope it will inspire a discussion on the wider implications of Raoul Wallenberg's legacy in today's world, including what we as individuals can learn from his actions. Wallenberg showed us that it is possible to make a difference through personal courage and by taking a stand."

Raoul Wallenberg

As Tauriainen suggested, Wallenberg, six decades after his imprisonment, is universally recognized as one of the heroes of the Holocaust and a role model of decency. Schools, streets and parks have been named after him and 32 monuments around the world have been erected in his honour.

In 1985, Canada conferred honorary citizenship on Wallenberg, and on Jan. 17, Canada Post will officially issue a postage stamp to commemorate him.

On Jan. 16, under the auspices of the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre in Toronto, a Canadian documentary film, The Angel of Budapest, was screened at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre to mark Wallenberg's accomplishments.

But as Canadian commentator Andrew Cohen reminds us, Canada's celebratory embrace of Wallenberg is historically ironic.

Writing in the Ottawa Citizen last month, Cohen – a journalist and Carleton University professor of journalism and international affairs – observed, "The truth is that no country did as much to question, even demean, his humanitarianism than Canada in 1944."

He adds, "While Wallenberg was fighting in Budapest to save as many Jews as he could, in Ottawa the dominion government of Mackenzie King was resisting the suggestion that it take in any Jews at all. The cabinet decided, in fact, that no Jews would be admitted to Canada, though it did agree to maintain 500 to 1,000 refugees in Turkey or Switzerland, if they could get there."

Cohen goes on to say that Vincent Massey, Canada's high commissioner in Britain, characterized the campaign to save Hungarian Jews as "an American ploy" cynically designed to help re-elect Roosevelt in an election year.

According to historians Irving Abella and Harold Troper, the co-authors of None is Too Many, Canada and the Jews of Europe 1933-1948, the Canadian government admitted only about 5,000 Jewish refugees during that period.

Program looks at Orthodox who leave the fold

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Torah in Motion will examine the "off the derech" issue – the question of observant Jews leaving Orthodox practice – as part of a program this weekend on "Educating our Children in a Complex World."

The program at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation will begin Saturday night (Jan. 19) with a screening of The Rabbi's Daughter, a documentary about three women who have all gone "off the derech" and whose fathers are prominent rabbis in Israel.

A panel discussion on "Leaving Judaism: The Return to Questioning" will follow. Participants will include Rabbi Yakov Horowitz, dean of Yeshiva Darchei Noam of Monsey, N.Y., who will speak the following morning about "Keeping our children safe;" Rabbi Daniel Korobkin of the BAYT; Leah Malamet, who is completing her PhD in clinical psychology, and Arie Margolies, a student from Dallas, Texas, who will also speak Sunday on "Why I went 'Off the Derech,' and why you are all wrong about it." TIM co-founder Elliott Malamet will moderate the panel.

Rabbi Jay Kelman, director of Torah in Motion (TIM), said that children's education and the possibility of going "off the derech" – whether that means giving up kashrut and Shabbat observance, or in some cases endangering physical welfare by, for example, turning to drugs – is an ongoing issue.

"The problem is increasing," said Rabbi Kelman. "It's painful for the family, and in certain circles, there are other implications," he added, citing the possible impact on marriage prospects.

At the same time, he noted, "our generation is probably more 'on the derech' than any other generation since the Emancipation... Orthodoxy is much stronger than it was. More people are committed to it."

Rabbi Michael Skobac of Jews for Judaism, who will speak Sunday morning about "Making Judaism compelling for our students," said that today's world is "saturated with competing voices."

He said he has often encountered Orthodox Jews whose spiritual life may be "non-existent or dry." It's an issue that often isn't talked about, he said. "I think it's certainly a phenomenon in the community."

Event to focus on teens and social media

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

It's a major challenge to raise teenagers in an age when they know more about technology than their parents, said Larry Borins, a social worker and a psychotherapist.

Borins said this is the first generation that has more expertise than their parents in an area that is such a major part of their lives, which leads to several concerns. For instance, parents might try to create barriers for their children by setting passwords to limit their children's access to the Internet, but might not be able to outsmart their kids.

"Children seem to know how to rewire the whole house, and often they're two steps ahead of the parents when it comes to technology," he said.

Borins and Rabbi Jarrod Grover of Beth Tikvah Synagogue will host a Jan. 19 discussion at the shul that will consider the problems that come with raising a teenager with social media.

Rabbi Grover said the idea for the program came about after 15-year-old Amanda Todd's cyberbullying story came to light. On the Shabbat after Todd committed suicide, Rabbi Grover spoke to his congregation about her story, and he realized some families showed a real interest in the issue, he said.

"Not that there's mention of cyberbullying in the Torah," Rabbi Grover said, "but there's a heck of a lot of concern in Judaism with lashon hara, speaking evil, treating others the way we want to be treated."

He said he hopes children of all ages, including high school students, will attend to hear about the Jewish perspective on bullying and self-confidence.

"You are greater and infinitely more important and special than anyone can ever make you out to seem," Rabbi Grover said. "It's about celebrating our kids and making sure they feel this is a place where they feel loved."

Borins will approach the topic from a psychological angle, discussing how social media affects children and families, and how parents regulate their children's online lives.

"Parenting always involves setting appropriate limits for kids and trying to create the right boundaries," he said, explaining that may sometimes involve setting time or content limits on their technology.

Natalie Kaplan, a committee member of the synagogue, said she thinks the discussion is especially important for any parent with preteens or teenagers. She is the mother of a 10-year-old girl and recognizes she will need to set rules about social technology.

Social worker and psychotherapist Larry Borins

"I can see now, she and her friends are very excited about getting new technology," Kaplan said. "They're all asking for iPods and those kinds of things for birthday presents."

She agreed with Borins that, as a parent, it's hard setting boundaries when children know more about the technology than they do, she said.

It all comes down to communication between parents and their children, said Borins, who has a two-year-old child.

"I think it's in some ways [technology] allowing us to connect in good ways," he said. "On the other hand, it's preventing us from having real-time connections. We're so busy hiding behind the screen that we're not really having the connections that matter."

This "authentic communication" is the key to working with children and ensuring they understand the parents' concerns.

"I think they should be having discussions with young people and collaborating – trying to solve problems together and to also spend time online together," Borins said.

He said the American Academy of Pediatrics warned parents to limit their kids' screen time to two hours per day, but most children spend much longer than that.

"What kind of impact does it have on their brain and their social skills and their ability to have face time?" he asked. Additionally, he said the same pediatric association said children under the age of two should not have any screen time at all.

Ultimately, the Jan. 19 discussion won't solve the problems, but it will highlight some of the biggest concerns and give various perspectives on solutions, he said.

"Hopefully this group, for me, will be an opportunity for me to have an open dialogue and to create a space for shared learning," Borins said.

KosherTube encourages Jewish online learning

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

KosherTube, an interactive video website, is YouTube's younger Jewish cousin.

As the official website of the Electronic Torah Educational Foundation and the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre, KosherTube was established in 2007 by Rabbi David Ostriker and Michael Kigel. It officially went online in November 2008 and has content from contributors around the globe.

Rabbi Ostriker said he and Kigel created the site to encourage the understanding of Judaism through the use of participatory video. "It gave people the opportunity to learn and have insights into a world that they were curious about, but had little or no knowledge of."

Kigel is dean of the Jewish Leadership Program at the Lauder Business School in Vienna, Austria, and is the producer and host of 10 seasons of Passages and Messages on CTS. Rabbi Ostriker has served on the executive committee of the Academy of Canadian Cinema and Television, is a past chair of the Canadian Independent Film Caucus, and brings more than 40 years of media experience to KosherTube.

In its first three years of operation, KosherTube had more than 12 million video-hit screenings. Currently, the site has more than 400,000 video-hits per month. With more than 7,000 videos to browse, which means more than 5,000 hours of content, viewers are always up to date on Jewish topics of interest.

"We provide the technology for you to become a registered member and upload video," Rabbi Ostriker said. "The 'kosher' part of our name is our promise to you that everything on this site will be kosher. Anything that fits into the observant lifestyle is appropriate. Unlike on YouTube, uploaded videos will not be viewable to the public until they are watched and vetted by our team."

Rabbi Ostriker said the goal is to make KosherTube "a vast and wonderful source of video on all things kosher: the spiritual and the practical, and fun stuff, too. We have an archive of hundreds of hours of materials that we developed over many years."

For Jews who are not very familiar with Judaism and its customs, KosherTube is a great stepping stone, he said. "It teaches the basics – how to make a seder or put on tfillin – and gets your feet wet. Hopefully you will get comfortable with the water. No one wants to be embarrassed with their lack of knowledge. KosherTube plays a big role in making people comfortable with learning about Judaism."

Rabbi David Ostriker

He said the website's target audience is "anyone interested in Yiddishkeit or anyone who wants to enjoy a kosher lifestyle – through travel, entertainment or recreation." While the site can even appeal to non-Jews, he said two-thirds of the regular viewers are observant Jews.

Rabbis and scholars from Canada, the United States, Israel and other countries are recorded weekly and uploaded to KosherTube. The team also searches the Internet for new and unique videos to embed on their site – "kosher videos that shed light on our world."

Users of KosherTube benefit from the site's content, Rabbi Ostriker said. From bringing naches to family members by sending video greetings to organizing chesed projects with other users around the world, the value is endless.

Those who sign up can attend any of the online video classes available at KosherTube, including Judaism 101. "As long as it's kosher, the only limit to the content on KosherTube is our users' imagination and ambition. Users can post weekly vorts [words] on the parshah; host video shiurim [lessons], which other users can subscribe to, and post questions, receive responses and participate in any number of discussions on any number of topics."

Rabbi Ostriker said users can even share "life's joys and passages: announce births, engagements, weddings and bereavement; send video 'mazal tovs' and prayers for a refuah shleimah [recovery from illness]; pay video tribute to loved ones who have passed on, but whose influence continues to be felt, and create a group to offer Shabbos hospitality."

As KosherTube grows and moves beyond a website "to a place in cyberspace that fosters genuine community, users will control much of the content," Rabbi Ostriker said. "There is no limit to what KosherTube users can do."

Winnipeg United Church rejects boycott proposal

'Life is not just about politics, it's about friendship'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A Winnipeg United Church congregation is attempting to undo the "damage" caused by the church's national General Council by publicly opposing the council's call for an economic boycott of products from Israeli settlements.

In a letter sent to the church's national office and released publicly, the Westminster United Church criticized the General Council's call for a boycott last summer. Such a step would be divisive, "with the potential to undermine interfaith conversations locally and nationally," the letter asserts.

"We do not support the economic boycott… The strategy recommended in the General Council statement has had and will continue to have a deleterious effect on the good relations established between the United Church and Jewish communities in Canada and in particular in Winnipeg," the letter states.

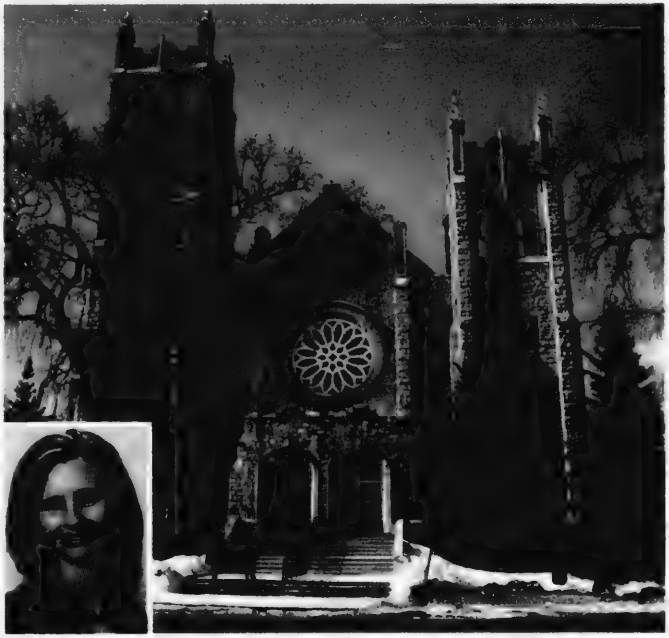
Last August, the United Church adopted several resolutions at its General Council in Ottawa that outraged supporters of Israel. Based on findings of a working group, the resolutions singled out the settlements as a principal obstacle to peace, called on Israel to suspend settlement expansion, and expressed regret for previously asking Palestinians to acknowledge Israel as a Jewish state as a precondition to peace.

The Jewish community reacted angrily, with some rabbis and other leaders saying it could spell the end of interfaith dialogue with the church.

Sherrie Steiner, vice-chair of the board of the Westminster United Church, said she "heard from Jewish people in a personal and a professional capacity… Some Jewish friends said [the resolution] had an antisemitic tone."

"It was like the Mideast position was taking over the relationship," she said. It threatened to poison relations between the two communities.

At the same time, lay members of her own congregation were raising similar concerns that the local inter-community relationship was being defined by Mideast politics and resolutions adopted at the national council level.



Westminster United Church in Winnipeg. Inset: Sherrie Steiner, vice-chair of the church's board

Members of the Westminster church did not accept that it had "to be the defining statement between us. There's a complex relationship here that goes way back. Life is not just politics and economics, it's about friendship, culture and appreciating one's history," Steiner said.

The national church's statements, she continued, "didn't consider the entire region and the huge network of nations trying to eliminate one group."

Lay church members approached the board with their concerns, and the board reached out to its Jewish interlocutors. A meeting was set up in mid-November.

It was quite clear that "our Jewish colleagues were quite upset by the General Council statements. It was pretty tense around the table," Steiner said.

Afterward, church officials discussed the possibility of the relationship deteriorating. The board decided to issue its public letter, and send another one to the church's national office. Steiner wouldn't make the second letter available, but she did say it raised concerns about the process that led to adoption of the resolutions.

"History would lend itself to the interpretation that when there's a complete vetting, it's been voted down," she said.

For his part, Zane Tessler is gratified at the Westminster Church's stand. The national church's position has the potential for creating "a great divide in the relationship that's been going in the proper direction," said Tessler, chair of community relations for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

"There were some tensions locally, but they've been smoothed over."

The community understood the church decision was taken at the national level and did not necessarily represent the views of local churches, he continued. The federation "did not consider ending the dialogue. We took the approach to press forward with joint dialogue… to mend the harms that could have been caused."

In addition to participating in interfaith dialogue, the Winnipeg church, which has 450 members and another 300 to 350 supporting families, hosted Names Not Numbers, a travelling educational display that told the story of people interned at Dachau. Church representatives have also participated in Holocaust memorial events and in an interfaith concert that featured choirs from the church and Congregation Shaarey Zedek that raised money for the Canadian Museum For Human Rights, currently under construction in Winnipeg, said Rev. Robert Campbell, the church's spiritual leader.

As well, the church supports projects in Neve Shalom (Oasis of Peace), a co-operative village between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem that brings together Christians, Muslims and Jews.

The General Council's resolution "seemed to take sides, and I would like us to take everybody's side, to show we're concerned for the well-being of Palestinians and Israelis both," Rev. Campbell said.

USCJ CEO optimistic despite budget challenges

Conservative body runs cumulative deficit of over $5M

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Steven Wernick, CEO of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, says he feels "very enthusiastic and confident" about the organization's future, despite a budget deficit reported by JTA last week.

According to the Jan. 8 article, the USCJ, the congregational arm of the Conservative movement, ran a cumulative budget deficit of more than $5 million over the past two years, including losses of $3 million in 2012 and $2.7 million the previous year.

Rabbi Steven Wernick

Rabbi Wernick attributed the losses to three one-time expenditures: the settlement of a longstanding lawsuit related to ownership of the movement's Fuchsberg Center in Jerusalem that cost $887,000; structural reorganization resulting in a large number of severance packages, and the cost of implementing a new strategic plan.

"I was hired [in 2009] to be a change agent and develop a strategic plan, and to completely retool United Synagogue to provide value to its member congregations and to the Jewish world. That costs money," Rabbi Wernick told The CJN.

The reason for his confidence, he said, is that the "United Synagogue, over the last 20 years, was smart enough to create a significant reserve fund, and at this moment, we've been using it for what those funds are reserved for: a strategic turnaround and difficult times. The cash drawdown that has been used over the last two and three years has been tied directly to our strategic plan and to one extraordinary expense, a litigation judgment."

The USCJ, which has an annual operational budget of approximately $11 million, is preparing a fact sheet for congregants and will post its most recent audit online after its next board meeting Jan. 17, the rabbi said. "We want people to know the truth, and every person I've spoken to who's been involved in business knows that it costs money to do a turnaround... That's a capital investment in the future."

Rabbi Wernick told JTA that the organization hopes to reduce the deficit to $600,000 next year, and to balance the budget the following year.

Dues revenues from member congregations have been declining because USCJ hasn't increased dues in the past five years, Rabbi Wernick said. In July, there will be an increase of $1 per household, and there is a new fundraising arm as well.

In Toronto, three Conservative synagogues left USCJ in 2008, and Beth Tikvah Synagogue followed suit two months ago.

The organization has more than 600 member congregations (with 20 in Canada), representing a 14 per cent drop over the past decade, according to JTA.

"Over the last several decades, it's no secret that Conservative Judaism, numerically, has been in decline," Rabbi Wernick said.

"Most of the decline over the last decade has been fuelled by synagogues that have closed, merged, or for financial reasons can no longer afford to stay affiliated." He added that of those congregations that have left USCJ, Beth Tikvah is in the minority for leaving because they "weren't finding value in their affiliation."

Rabbi Philip Scheim

Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue said his sense is that the USCJ is one of many national Jewish organizations that are struggling, along with synagogues that are facing similar challenges.

"Society is moving away from the concept of membership," he said.

"I believe that belonging to an organization like United Synagogue is reflective of individuals belonging to a shul... You're doing this because you believe in what you're supporting. You believe in the values an institution represents."

Rabbi Scheim noted the value of the USCJ's youth programs in particular. For USY members to meet with their peers from across North America at annual conventions is "very powerful," he said.

"The truth is a major congregation is not necessarily going to need the services that a small congregation in a struggling community would need," he said. "But I think it's meaningful to be part of something greater than ourselves."

Rabbi Scheim – who in 2009 was part of Hayom, a group of "rabbis who basically formed a protest group" seeking change within the USCJ – said that, more recently, "good efforts have been made," including synagogue leadership development programs.

As well, Rabbi Scheim said he's "thrilled" to be part of a large community of congregations that help each other at times of crisis and welcome each other's members when they visit.

Irving Siegel, a past president of Thornhill's Beit Rayim Synagogue and USCJ's kehilla strengthening chair for eastern Canada, said that "United Synagogue remains the voice of Conservative Judaism here in the GTA and in North America... It still has the infrastructure for the Conservative movement. There's nothing really like it within North America that represents Conservative Judaism."

"The investments we've made are working," Rabbi Wernick said. "More and more synagogues are now acting to be able to take advantage of the resources we have."

In Canada, the USCJ is "working to provide more value," including an attempt to reconnect with congregations that are former members or potential members, Rabbi Wernick said.

At a recent USCJ event in Toronto, approximately 10 synagogues were represented by more than 30 people, Siegel said. As well, a Toronto conference on "Sacred Strategies, The Journey from Functional to Visionary" is scheduled for April.

In 2008, Beth Tikvah – which was then paying $41,000 annually in USCJ membership dues – voted to remain part of the organization, despite a recommendation at the time by its board of governors to terminate membership.

Around the same time, three other Toronto congregations – Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, and Beth Tzedec Congregation – left USCJ and formed a new organization, the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues (CCCS). Beth Sholom Synagogue, which had not been affiliated with the USCJ, was the fourth co-founder.

The group also lost a Montreal-based congregation, but president Eric Gossin said the CCCS is still "very active," with seven congregations, and now has "quite modest" dues that are "significantly less" than what they were. Its flagship program is its Hebrew high school, he added.

Weill said that USCJ membership is "very expensive, but it [would be] worth it if we were taking advantage of everything they have to offer."

He said Beth Tikvah has not joined the CCCS, but he'd like, personally, to promote the idea among the shul's membership. "I think there's a lot of synergy that can be created."

Rabbi Howard Markose

In 2008, Beth Tikvah's constitution made it difficult for the shul to leave the USCJ, as its constitution mandated membership in the organization. The relevant clause could be changed only if 75 percent of members voted in favour of the change at two consecutive meetings, The CJN reported at the time.

But the constitution was amended in 2011 so that "we would only need two-thirds of 100 members voting," Weill said.

The shul held information meetings in November before putting USCJ membership to a vote. It sent the organization a letter of resignation later that month.

One hundred forty four members voted, but Weill declined to be more specific about the percentage by which the vote passed.

MONTREAL — The Radio-Canada ombudsman has upheld two complaints of anti-Israel bias in its reporting from a Jewish advocacy group.

Pierre Tourangeau ruled that a Nov.16 Radio-Canada.ca report attributing the escalation of the recent Israel-Gaza conflict to the killing of Hamas' military chief did not conform to the broadcaster's standards.

HonestReporting Canada (HRC) felt the report was an unfair portrayal of Israel as the aggressor and ignored the fact the Netanyahu government was warning of a military action in response to the more than 120 rockets fired into Israel against its civilian population by Hamas from Gaza.

HRC, a pro-Israel media watchdog, filed a series of complaints with Radio-Canada related to its coverage of the most recent conflict between Israel and Gaza militants.

Tourangeau also upheld its objection to a Nov. 11 report on the broadcaster's website that was headlined "Israel Threatens the Palestinians."

Tourangeau commented: "The headline suggests that the threat proffered by the Israeli leaders was aimed not only at Hamas and the other armed groups in Gaza, as indicated in the article, but at Palestinians… The headline, being imprecise, does not respect [Radio-Canada's] norms and practices regarding accuracy."

After the complaint, the headline was changed to "Israel Threatens Hamas."

The Nov. 16 report that HRC objected to attributed Israel's targeted killing of Hamas military chief Ahmed Jabari as the event that "set off" the escalation.

"This version of events inverted the cause of the escalation, which started with the escalation of Hamas rocket fire and the targeting of an Israeli army Jeep patrol," said HRC Quebec director Michelle Whiteman.

Ahmed Jabari

Tourangeau wrote: "On the face of it, one cannot affirm, as does the Nov. 16 article, that the 'assassination of the military chief, Jabari, set things off' since he was killed in retaliation for Hamas' shelling campaign of Israel."

HRC said it's disappointed that the ombudsman didn't rule in favour of its other complaints.

These included a Nov. 23 report by Radio-Canada's Jean-François Bélanger on clashes between the Israeli army and Palestinians on the Israel-Gaza border after the ceasefire came into effect.

Bélanger reported that Palestinian farmers who wanted to return to their land were fired upon by soldiers, and "it is impossible for [the farmers] to [return], since these lands are now in a buffer zone declared by Israel."

HRC noted that IDF spokespeople and the Associated Press reported that the people who were shot at were among hundreds trying to storm the border with the intent of breaching it.

In his decision, Tourangeau cited a New York Times article by Jerusalem bureau chief Judy Rudoren who described confusion among Palestinians as to who could enter the buffer zone.

He stated that HRC wanted Radio-Canada to put more weight on the Israeli army's position that the Palestinians were attempting to enter Israel.

HRC denies this. "In reporting that these were 'farmers trying to get to their land,' Mr. Bélanger did not give a full picture of events that day, which included the fact that many were not farmers, as reported by the Associated Press and the Israeli spokesperson, but provocateurs attempting to infiltrate the border," said Whiteman.

Winnipeg CJA drive nears its $5.56M goal

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With less than three months to go in its 2012-2013 campaign, Winnipeg Combined Jewish Appeal has just about equalled its 2011-2012 total of $5.4 million and is just a little more than $200,000 short of its target of $5.56 million for this year.

"We've had 300 new donors this year [an increase of 55 from last year], from whom we raised about $100,000," said Elaine Goldstine, the CJA's executive director. "And we still have about 200 donors we haven't contacted yet. I am confident that we will reach our goal and possibly surpass it."

Goldstine added that the CJA's Women's Campaign has raised a record $1.3 million so far.

"We had four additional donors in the Lion of Judah category [minimum gift $5,000], which brings our total Lion of Judah donors to 80," she said.

The ongoing yearly increases for the Winnipeg CJA campaign over the past 10 years or more reflect the growing size of the Jewish community here. It's now estimated to be more than 17,000 people – a number that should be confirmed shortly after the 2011 census figures become available – compared to the 14,765 recorded in the 2001 census.

In the early part of the decade, several hundred Jewish immigrants from Argentina and other South American countries came to Winnipeg. In recent years, most of the continuing increase has come from Israeli families relocating here.

"Many of our newcomers have become involved in the community," Goldstine said. "We have a very well-rounded campaign involving people from all walks of life."

This is the first campaign since Winnipeg abandoned the two–line card. The city's Jewish community had been the last in North America to allow CJA donors to choose how much money they wished to allocate to local needs and how much to Israel.

Goldstine said the transition has gone smoothly.

"The [Jewish] Federation [of Winnipeg's] budget and allocations committee, when it meets in the spring, will determine how much to allocate to Israel," she said.

This year's campaign is being led by one of Canada's best-known and most successful fundraisers. Gail Asper was originally supposed to chair the annual campaign last year, but the need to raise more private funding for the Canadian Museum for Human Rights intervened.

The museum was the last major project launched by her father, the late broadcasting mogul Israel Asper, who died in October 2003. Asper has continued to fundraise for the museum, which is under construction, while leading the CJA campaign.

Gail Asper

"I have always been good at multitasking," she said.

"I felt that chairing the CJA campaign would be a good way to reconnect with the community. Considering that the Asper Foundation is the largest donor and I am the foundation's president, as chair of the campaign, I can get to know better the personnel involved in the community's governance and fundraising and well as the beneficiary agencies."

Asper praised the work of the CJA.

"I am very impressed by the level of transparency and scrutiny at every level," she said. "The CJA has a crack team and is an incredibly efficient operation. It is rare to find a fundraising operation where expenses are less than 10 per cent of the funds raised."

One of her priorities as chair, Asper said, will be growing the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's Leave More Than Memories Endowment Fund, which her father helped initiate in 1989. The fund, which is administered by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, currently has a capital base of $3 million.

"I am a huge believer in the importance of endowment funds," Asper said. "An endowment fund is a permanent source of funding that can serve as a buffer for regular donors who leave our community or pass away.

"And the best time to build on an endowment fund is when the parent organization is financially stable. This is a perfect time in our community to work on increasing the size of our endowment fund."

Harper named 'person of the year'

Compiled by CJN Staff

Representatives of the Russian-Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Russian Jewish community bestowed the corporation's 2012 "Person of the Year" Award on Prime Minister Stephen Harper earlier this month.

The small ceremony took place Jan. 7 in the prime minister's office in Ottawa.

In his presentation to Harper, Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, chief rabbi of Toronto's Jewish Russian Community Centre called him the "truest champion" of human rights.

"Your unwavering and principled support to our brothers and sisters in Israel – 1.3 million of whom are Russian-speaking – is a testament to both your morality and your courage. You are a shining beacon of light and clarity in this often dark and confused world," Rabbi Zaltzman said.

A statement from the camp said that Wise "was a selfless individual who took a genuine interest in the lives of everyone she came across. As the director of Crestwood Valley Day Camp from 1990 until her retirement in 2005, Rochelle dedicated herself to the personal growth and development of every child and staff member in her care, and to creating summer memories that would last a lifetime. With limitless energy, unwavering courage and a passion for children she was an inspiration to a generation of kids, an example to day camp directors across Toronto, and an amazing friend to those of us at Crestwood Valley."

A bereavement notice sent to Shaarei Shomayim members said that the couple "were important longtime members of our community along with their children and grandchildren. They were both selfless individuals who took a genuine interest in the lives of everyone they came across."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Gefilte fish, Part 2

Haymishe versus store-bought. Sweet versus pepper. How could a food like gefilte fish engender such passion? Well, considering we are talking about Jews and food, how could it not!

One of the most heated debates in Jewish culinary is over how to best prepare gefilte fish: sweet or peppery. According to Michael Steinlauf, who teaches Jewish studies at Gratz College in Philadelphia, how you fancy your fish can actually tell a lot about your heritage. "The gefilte-fish line," as Steinlauf puts it, "ran though eastern Poland. Jews living to the west – most of Poland, as well as Germany and the rest of western Europe – ate the sweet gefilte fish. Those to the east – Lithuania, Latvia and Russia – ate the peppery treat." [http://bit.ly/gefilte8]

That gefilte-fish line is nothing new to Allan Evans. I chanced upon a fiery e-mail he sent to a kosher food message board, looking for advice on finding takeout gefilte fish without sugar in New York City. "Having been raised on the subtle tart Litvak style of preparing this dish, the sweetening of this delicacy is an abomination to the palate." [http://bit.ly/gefilte10]

Evans would be advised to stay away from the next recipe. "My mother-in-law's Sweet Style Gefilte Fish" calls for 2/3 cup sugar, 1/2 pound ground whitefish, 1/2 pound ground pike, 1 pound of ground perch, and yet another 1/3 cup sugar for the broth. [http://bit.ly/gefilte9]

If you don't have time for all that, a popular time saver is to spruce up a frozen loaf of fish, which will give you "the look and taste of homemade." [http://bit.ly/gefilte12] But let's just say that would be less than appealing to Joe Hartman. A few years ago, the owner of Hartman's Kosher Meats in Toronto, wrote that each Friday afternoon he sells roughly 30 loaves of gefilte fish, a delicacy lost on the younger generation. "These kids don't appreciate what goes into making gefilte fish... They don't put their heart and soul into it like their parents or grandparents did. It takes lots of work, but now you can just walk into any supermarket to buy it." [http://bit.ly/gefilte13]

Mark Mietkiewicz

Tammy from New York seems to straddle both sides of the homemade versus store-bought debate. Tammy is the winner of the Great Gefilte Fish-off and has generously supplied her late bubbie's delicious recipe. But Tammy adds, "Making gefilte fish is, quite frankly, a pain in the ass. Even my grandmother would agree. She and I both got lazy in our old age and doctored the store-bought stuff, which turned out surprisingly well and fooled everyone." [http://bit.ly/gefilte14]

So if you want to cheat, shhh, the folks at Torahbytes will also give you a hand. They advise you to buy "one large jar gefilte fish; good brand, even if not on sale." The secret is to add your own beets, carrots, onions and seasonings to the fish stew. Bring it all to a boil. Turn down and simmer for 45 minutes. "No one will ever know unless you tell." [http://bit.ly/gefilte15]

Next time, gefilte fish – trendy at last?

The song of prayer

The lion is in dire straits and needs advice to extricate himself from the situation. The unfortunate fox crosses the lion's path, with no way of escape. "Tell me, Mr. Fox," the lion says, "I hear you are very clever. I need your help to solve my problem." The fox is now really on the spot.

The fox tells the lion, "It is true that I am very smart and can help you, but my wisdom is in my heart, which I left in my cave this morning in my hurry to leave. If you will permit me to scamper back home, I will gladly get my heart and then help you." A clever fox indeed.

The Ben Ish Hai (1832-1909) told this parable to introduce a story of a pious woman who was hurrying to the synagogue one day, and she was stopped by one of the town mockers. "Where are you running to?" the man asked, laughing.

"To pray in the synagogue," she answered.

"But where is your siddur?" he replied. "Shouldn't you run back home and get it?"

"My siddur is deep within me, as I pray from my heart," replied the woman. "You, Sir, may have your siddur, but you should run back home to get your heart just like the fox!"

"Can you do me a favour and get my heart for me?" mocked the man.

"I'd be happy to," the woman said, "but I don't know where you put it. Is it at home with your wife, or is it at work? Is it perhaps at sea in a freight container?

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Or might it be in London or in Paris? Only you know where it is, so you must get it yourself!"

When going to the synagogue, says the Ben Ish Hai, one's heart is most essential – even indispensable.

As I get older, I realize how important it is to serve HaShem with one's heart, as we read every day in the Shema.

King David sings in Psalms (100:2), "Serve God joyfully," and joy, as we know, comes from the heart.

Prayer is more meaningful when we invest feeling and emotion through singing together. One doesn't even have to understand the words in order to join in; one just has to meditate by singing, humming, or even just listening. Participation through voice in prayer with our fellow congregants is extremely powerful on a personal, as well as a communal level. When I hear someone expressing authentic emotions through song, it gives me goose bumps. At times, I feel so connected that I have tears in my eyes

We Sephardi Jews are blessed with a powerful way of increasing our happiness because our heritage includes singing during our tfillah. After all, prayerful song originates in the heart.

My voice teacher once wrote that I should remember I'm God's vessel, and He relates His message through my voice. So much truth revolves around the vibrations of the voice.

Let us remember that we are all God's vessels and that we are utterly free to express our emotions through the heartfelt song of prayer.

It's my body

We received a gift for our 10-month-old daughter: a two-CD set titled Kids' Greatest Hits. Buried somewhere on the first disk is Head and Shoulders, a classic I remember from my own childhood. I remember, as a kid, giggling while trying to point to the right body part as the song's tempo increased: "Head and shoulders, knees and toes; eyes, ears, mouth and nose."

At the end of bath time with our daughter, we sing the song, point to the right body part, take her out of the bath, and pat her dry. The song is a good transition, indicating the end of the bath and the beginning of our bedtime ritual.

When we first played the CD, we noticed that the words on this newer version have changed. "Head and shoulders, knees and toes; it's my body." A change that we initially chalked up to a variant text.

In the last few weeks, since the Jewish Daily Forward reported allegations of abuse by staff at the Yeshiva University High School for Boys from the late '70s to the early '90s, the variant text has come into focus.

Abuse in religious institutions is too common. In my relatively short career in education, I have worked at three organizations shaken by abuse. After the shock, come investigations and apologies, genuinely honest. Then, committed and caring leaders have confronted the difficult question: how can we proactively stop the abuse of power that is only magnified by the power of religious authority?

Policy is a start, but it's not enough.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Years ago, when I began to work at a summer camp in the United States, I was required to complete a criminal background check. While these checks remain an important tool, the background check only attested that I had not been arrested in that state. But before arriving at camp, I had never set foot in that state.

Coupled with policy, institutions and families must begin a difficult culture change.

When I began running Shabbatonim, weekend retreats for high school students, my supervisor pulled me aside and reminded me that I was vulnerable. As a young, single teacher close in age to program participants, I needed to be extra vigilant. Throughout my work with the program, I was blessed with a male colleague who spent nights with me schmoozing with participants and checking the dorms. Partially out of fear and partially out of a sense of responsibility, I was never alone with the students. While some would argue that this distance dulls the impact of a holistic education, it drives home a moral value of safety and caring.

Similarly, a new culture of awareness and empowerment must be developed in our children. My daughter's CD is one small piece in changing the culture. From the youngest age, we – parents and educators – must teach our children what is inappropriate. We must instil in them a sense of confidence and security to raise questions, lodge complaints and report abuse.

As difficult as it will be, in my mind, I am already planning the conversation to explain to my daughter why the song's ending has changed from "eyes, ears, mouth and nose" to "it's my body."

Beni Abileah – a reminiscence

Guest Voice

The date 12/12/12, in addition to being regarded as "unusual," was a bad day.

My friend, Benjamin (Beni) Abileah died that day in Jerusalem, after fighting a stroke for some months.

Many Canadian Jews from Toronto to Vancouver will remember Beni as the popular and very active consul general of Israel from 1987 to 1991. He represented his country with passion and dedication. He made countless friends easily. He and his wife, Ruth, were popular hosts and guests in the community. He brought to bear, not merely his training in diplomacy, but the vast knowledge he had from the world of business, from his time in the economic division of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and from his roles as deputy director and then director of MASHAV, the ministry's Centre for International Co-operation.

Benjamin (Beni) Abileah

My wife, Judy, and I came to know him well, as he was a willing and important liaison between her and "the intelligence," in her work of rescuing Jews from Syria.

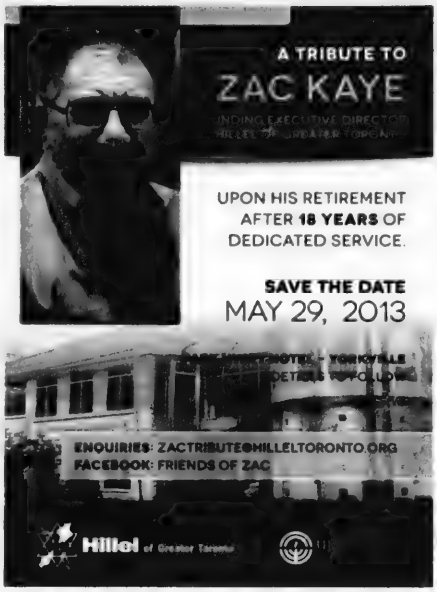
When he left Toronto, Beni took a leave of absence from the ministry, to become director general of the Bible Lands Museum in Jerusalem, from the time of its opening, until he saw it through its "running in" period.

There, too, was a strong connection with Toronto. The founder of that museum was the late Elie Borowski. Borowski had lived here for some time, and he had donated his magnificent collection of Near East artefacts to Bible Lands Museum of Toronto, which, in turn, placed that collection on permanent loan to the museum in Jerusalem.

After serving in the ministry for more than 34 years, in places such as Cyprus, the Philippines, Los Angeles, New York, Washington and the Republic of Georgia, Beni "retired" with the rank of ambassador in 1996.

Unlike many of his colleagues, Beni immediately went back to work as senior adviser on planning and evaluation of the same MASHAV and was also the national co-ordinator of its Regional Agricultural Program of Egypt-Israel-Jordan-Palestinian Authority. This little-known, but important initiative, inspired and supported by Denmark, established co-operation in areas such as dry land agriculture, saline water, post-harvest technology, marketing and women in agriculture. Despite predictable tensions and obstacles, substantial success has been achieved over more than a decade.

It was in his office in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, working on these projects, that Beni was stricken.



Coach Susie Fishbein steps up to the plate

By Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Susie Fishbein delivers a winning game plan to inspire her readers and teach them how to become better cooks in Kosher by Design Cooking Coach: Recipes, tips and techniques to make anyone a better cook. The popular cookbook author offers up 120 delectable recipes from all over the world. There are 400 full-colour photos by food photographer John Uher. Fishbein generously shares the skills and secrets that have worked for her as an everyday cook with a super-busy life. This is her eighth cookbook, and her advice works for cooks of all levels, from novice to expert.

There are excellent tutorials on how to choose knives, sharpen and store them. Fishbein says, "I can make any recipe that I have ever written with a simple and basic set of 3 knives."

You'll find colour photos of different brands of food processors, blenders, mixers, immersion blenders, thermometers and Fishbein's recommendations for cutting boards and essential cookware. "When buying pots and pans, buy the best you can afford... they will last a lifetime. Don't be tempted to buy a set. I prefer open stock so I can get just the pieces I need."

Fishbein provides a detailed list of basic ingredients you should always have on hand for a well-stocked kosher kitchen, including fresh lemons, olive oil, sriracha sauce (a kind of hot sauce), rice vinegar, coconut milk, quinoa, panko and chicken bones, along with helpful tips on buying and storing spices.

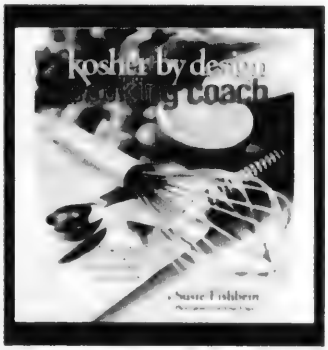
There are 10 comprehensive chapters, including appetizers, salads, soups, fish, poultry, meat, side dishes, pasta/eggs and desserts. Each chapter starts with a Game Plan to guide the reader about basic cooking techniques. You'll learn plating and garnishing techniques, how to clean and store lettuce for a salad, how to choose the best baking ingredients and much more.

I really love the Game Plan for the meat chapter, which includes a pictorial guide and demystifies the various cuts of kosher meats, explaining how to cook them properly for best results. Fishbein explains: "Different stores and butchers use different names for the same cuts of meat. This can make it very confusing. Many nice roasts come from the chuck and can be used interchangeably in recipes like pot roast or in those that sear and then braise the roasts in liquids and then cook them slowly and covered."

Fishbein's family is anti-leftovers so she created a "Playbook" to help you "reincarnate food" – cook once, eat twice! When making Helene's Turkey Taco Egg Rolls, make a double batch of filling and freeze some. Then mix the thawed turkey filling with marinara sauce and use it to stuff Portobello mushroom caps or serve over pasta. Tonight's Moroccan Chicken can be tomorrow's Moroccan Couscous, and Soy-Poached Salmon is transformed into an Asian Rice Bowl for tomorrow's lunch. Marvelous makeovers!

You'll find a wide variety of tempting recipes: among them, Roast Turkey with Maple Mustard Glaze (one of Fishbein's favourites), Yemenite Meat Soup (her husband's favourite), Sweet Potato Squash Kugel (for those on gluten-free or low-carb diets), Miso-Glazed Eggplant, Chocolate Babka Meltaway and Chocolate Peanut Butter Molten Cakes.

Cooking Coach is like going to cooking school, but in the comfort of your own kitchen! Here are some recipes to please your palate.



TURKEY SHEPHERD'S PIE WITH SWEET POTATO TOPPING

An old childhood favourite gets a makeover! The gorgeous sweet potato crust hides a healthy and delicious turkey filling, a nice change from the ground beef of its ancestors.

6 large sweet potatoes, peeled, cut into 1/2-inch chunks
1/3 cup real maple syrup, NOT pancake syrup
1/2 tsp. fine sea salt
1/8 tsp. cayenne
1 tbsp. plus 2 tsp. canola oil, divided
2 lb. ground turkey
1 medium onion, peeled, cut into 1/4-inch dice
3 cloves fresh garlic, minced
1 1/2 tsp. dried oregano

New techniques

1/2 tsp. ground sage
1/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 1/2 cups chicken stock
1 1/2 tsp. cornstarch dissolved in 2 tsp. water
1 cup (6 oz.) frozen green peas
1 1/2 tbsp. dark brown sugar

Bring a large pot of water to a boil. Add the sweet potatoes. Boil until fork-tender, about 15-20 minutes. Drain very well. Mash with the maple syrup, salt and cayenne. Set aside.

Heat 1 tbsp. canola oil in a medium skillet over medium heat. Add the turkey in one piece, as it comes from the package. This allows for good caramelization and flavour. Once caramelized and brown, flip the turkey to sear the second side. Use a wooden spoon to break up the chunk and cook just until no longer pink in the centre, about 3 minutes – not longer, since turkey dries out easily. Transfer to a bowl, chopping more with the spoon. Set aside.

Add remaining 2 tsp. canola oil to the pan. Heat. Add the onion and garlic. Use a wooden spoon to stir up the fond from the drippings. Cook until the onion caramelizes, about 6-7 minutes. Add the oregano, sage and black pepper. Cook for 3 minutes longer until the spices are fragrant. Add the turkey to the pan. Add the stock and dissolved cornstarch. Stir well to distribute the onions. Bring to a simmer. Cook until slightly thickened. Add the peas and cook until they are shiny, 3 minutes. Transfer to a 9x13-inch oven-to-table casserole dish. Spread the sweet potato in an even layer over the turkey.

Preheat oven to broil. Sprinkle the top of the sweet potatoes with the brown sugar. Place the dish 3-4 inches from the heating element and broil for 5-6 minutes until the brown sugar starts to caramelize. Serve hot. Yield: 12 servings.

KALE CHIPS

Fishbein writes, "I remember from my pregnancy days that kale is one of the healthiest foods around. After a few misses with recipe ideas, this one was a pleasant surprise for my kids. If you start with bone-dry kale, you will end up with a crispy, potato chip-like result that is surprisingly addictive. My kids were snacking on them right off the cookie sheet – the first batch never even made it to the dinner table. If you have leftovers, which I doubt, you can re-crisp them, uncovered, the next day in the oven.

olive oil-flavoured cooking spray
1 large bunch curly kale, thick ribs removed and discarded, washed, dried very well
3 tbsp. olive oil
1/2 tsp. garlic powder
1/8 tsp. smoked paprika
1/8 tsp. ground white pepper
fine sea salt

Preheat oven to 375. Cover a jelly roll pan with aluminum foil and spray with nonstick cooking spray. Place the pan into the oven as it preheats.

Roughly cut the kale into large pieces. Place the dried kale into a large bowl. If the kale is wet, it will steam rather than crisp in the oven. Drizzle on the olive oil and, using your hands, toss to coat the leaves well. Sprinkle on the garlic powder, smoked paprika and white pepper. Toss well.

Carefully remove the hot pan from the oven once it is fully heated. Place the kale onto the pan. It is okay if some overlap slightly. Spray the tops with one more sweep of nonstick olive oil cooking spray.

Roast, uncovered, for about 10-12 minutes until the kale is deeper in colour, crisp, and a little brittle. Go by colour more than by time, so keep checking. Remove individual leaves as they are done. Don't overcook or the leaves will taste burnt. Immediately sprinkle with a batch of fine sea salt. Yield: 4 servings.

CAJUN QUINOA

I like the Ancient Harvest brand of quinoa because it is pre-washed. If you can't find that, just rinse the quinoa well in a fine-mesh strainer to remove the soapy coating. I have a small, 6-cup bundt pan that works nicely with this recipe. I spray it heavily with nonstick cooking spray and then pack in the quinoa once it has cooked. To unmould, I just hold a plate over the top and invert. You can also do this in individual bundt pans or silicone moulds.

1 cup red quinoa
1 cup quinoa
4 cups chicken or vegetable stock
1 tbsp. canola oil
1 small red onion, cut into 1/2-inch dice neck of 1 small butternut squash, peeled, cut lengthwise, cut into 1/4-inch dice (1-1/2 cups)
3 cloves fresh garlic, minced
1/2 tsp. dried thyme
1 tbsp. Cajun seasoning blend
1/4 tsp. fine sea salt
1/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
2 plum tomatoes, seeded, cut into 1/4-inch dice
2 scallions, roots trimmed, sliced thinly or diagonal

Place the red and plain quinoa into a medium pot. Add the stock. Bring to a boil over high heat. Turn the heat down and simmer for 15-18 minutes, until all the water is absorbed.

Heat the canola oil in a large (12-14-inch) skillet over medium heat. Add the onion, squash, garlic and thyme. Sauté until the vegetables are shiny and soft, about 6-8 minutes. Add the Cajun seasoning, salt, pepper, tomatoes and scallions. Sauté for 3 minutes. Remove from heat. Stir the quinoa into the vegetables. Toss to combine. Transfer to serving dish or mould as per headnote. Yield: 8 servings.

Israelis help African refugees

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

A petition calling on the international community to share responsibility for resolving the African refugee crisis in Israel is currently circulating among academic, human rights and interfaith leaders across the globe.

Israeli artist Yigal Shtayim doesn't have time to dwell on whether the petition, which is endorsed by the Hebrew-University-Hadassah Genocide Prevention Program and the Israeli Association to Combat Genocide, will achieve its goal of finding "a world solution for a world problem" because he is busy organizing hot meals for migrants in Tel Aviv.

Shtayim is one of the leaders of the Soup for Levinsky group that organizes hot meals for migrants at the Tel Aviv Central Bus Station. The volunteers who make up this group recently handed out the 220,000th meal.

"We prevent starvation every day," Shtayim told The CJN. "Tikkun olam is more important than a peace plan. The tikkun has to come from a point of moral understanding, what is right."

The world has been quick to criticize Jerusalem's handling of the refugees, but away from the political arena, every day Israelis are proving that "repairing the world" is still possible.

Soup for Levinsky – named for Levinsky Park in south Tel Aviv where the migrants gather – is an example of what private citizens are doing to help the African refugees in Israel. Shtayim co-founded the group in January 2012. He said there are 30 regular volunteers, 250 semi-regular volunteers and thousands of one-time helpers.

"We don't just add up the people who come to the bus station at night. We also offer breakfast. We have families that are not connected to the park but to whom we drop off food. We also have a branch in Eilat," he said. "We help thousands of people every day."

Local churches in Tel Aviv – often in co-operation with the municipality – as well as other private groups also serve food to the park's residents on a regular basis.

In fact, there's an ever-growing list of non-profit organizations helping the asylum seekers with social services and humanitarian aid. There are also groups that represent their needs before the courts, including the African Refugee Development Center (ARDC), ASAF, Bnai Darfur, Hotline for Migrant Workers, Mesila, and Physicians for Human Rights.

And while Tel Aviv is a hub for the refugees, the African asylum seekers can be found throughout Israel. The young ones are being given free education and often full board as well.

There are 17 African refugee boys currently living and studying at the Dr. Israel Goldstein Youth Village. The youth village was set up to give new immigrant teens and socially disadvantaged Israeli-born youth, "a safe, nurturing educational community in which to live and learn – and to reach their potential."

Three years ago, director Pini Cohen heard about a group of 19 refugees needing a place to live and learn. That first group flourished at the village and opened the door for the current 17 Eritrean students.

"All of them start off at a detention camp. They need a chance to have a life," Judy Segal, director of development of the village, told The CJN. "Director Pini Cohen wants to teach our children the moral value of helping others. He said, 'I'm going to do everything I can for these children so our children will see how important it is to help.' The village really does save children, and I'm very proud we've undertaken this project."

Segal said the Eritreans are provided with housing, clothing and food. In addition to teaching them Hebrew, math and English, the African students are taught a vocation "so that they'll be able to work."

While none has served in the Israel Defence Forces yet, Segal said it is a goal of many of the graduates. "They say they want to give to Israel the way Israel has given to them," she noted.

Archaeological discovery sheds light on biblical mystery

Aryeh Savir
Tazpit News Agency

Recent archeological findings in the West Bank shed light on the incompletely recounted biblical story of the destruction of Shiloh, the ancient capital of Israel.

An uncovered broken clay pitcher lying in a layer of reddish ashes complete the story of the devastation of Shiloh where the Mishkan, the Tabernacle, was located during the period of the Judges, and essentially served as Israel's capital and in the 13th century BCE during the First Israelite commonwealth.

The findings were discovered during a massive dig of Tel Shiloh, the site of ancient Shiloh, in which some 1,000 youth volunteers from across Israel took part, site director Avital Selah told Tazpit News Agency.

Similar findings were discovered some 30 years ago, including leftovers of food, which were also dated to 1050 BCE, but the newly discovered layer of ashes completes the story regarding the story of the destruction of the ancient Israelite capital.

Shiloh served as the spiritual centre of Israel for 369 years until its destruction.

The Bible does not say how it was destroyed, but the book of Samuel tells of a battle between the Philistines and the Israelites, during which the Philistines prevailed, and during which the Holy Ark was captured. After hearing the news of the defeat from a messenger, Eli the High Priest, the leader of his time who lost his two sons in the battle, fell down and died. This is all the account in Samuel says. It's known that Shiloh was destroyed shortly thereafter. It's also known from the book of Jeremiah that Shiloh was destroyed by the Philistines, and these new findings help explain how it happened.

After the battle, which took place at Even Haezel, near modern-day Rosh Ha'ayin, the Philistines moved on to destroy Shiloh, with the objective of obliterating the capital. The ashes found attest to a devastating fire the occurred on the site. The dating of the clay pitcher, 1050 BCE, correlates with the dating of the events depicted in book of Samuel.

Embassy rep explains Israel's electoral system

Sammy Hudes
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — With Israel gearing up to elect its next Knesset on Jan. 22, it's important for young supporters of Israel to understand the country's democratic process, the Israeli embassy's deputy head of mission Eliaz Luf said at a Jan. 8 discussion at Carleton University.

Luf spoke to roughly 20 students, mostly political science or journalism majors, as part of an informal lecture co-organized by the embassy and Ottawa's citywide Israel Awareness Committee (IAC).

The lecture covered the basics of Israel's electoral system, as well as Israel's political history dating back to its first legislative election and a survey of the parties expected to win seats in the upcoming Knesset.

One key point of discussion was the vast differences between the electoral systems in Israel and Canada, which Luf said makes it difficult for many students to understand Israeli politics.

"The systems are very different, and if people are interested in Israel and want to understand [its politics] a little bit better, they should actually know about this system," Luf said.

He explained how, unlike Canada's first-past-the-post system, Israel uses proportional representation, in which citizens vote for a party rather than a candidate, and it also lacks individual districts known as ridings.

"Even Canadian MPs that I was talking to, people that are really into politics, find it very hard to understand how [the Israeli electoral system] works," Luf said. "They keep asking me if [Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu] is going to get a majority. I'm sure [Netanyahu] wouldn't mind to have a majority, but it's not going to happen for him or for anybody else."

The main reason majority governments are nearly impossible in Israel is due to the large number of smaller parties that are able to gain seats in Knesset, which forces larger parties to form coalitions in order to govern, Luf explained.

"Back in the 1980s, the major party, whether it was the Likud or the Ma'arach, had close to 50 seats [out of 120], so they didn't need so many partners," he said.

Currently however, Likud, the largest party in the governing coalition, has just 28 seats.

"They don't even have 50 per cent of their own coalition," Luf said. "It's very hard to rule that way and it gives the smaller parties a much stronger position."

Luf called instability "the sickness of our system," noting that the average Knesset seems to last just 2-1/2 to three years, although the current one nearly made it to the intended four years.

Numerous issues could have an impact on the make-up of the 19th Knesset, including international pressure to negotiate with the Palestinians, settlements and security concerns, and what Luf describes as the need to replace the former Tal law, which spells out clear rules as to whether or not haredi Jews can be drafted into the IDF.

The Israeli embassy's deputy head of mission, Eliaz Luf, teaches the basics of Israel's electoral system.

The more knowledge advocates for Israel have about these issues, the easier it is to discuss Israel with others on campus, Luf said.

"I think it's important for [students] as the messengers to explain Israel as a solid democratic [state]," he said. "Democracy is very rooted in Israel, and it's not like other countries in our region. The democracy of Israel is alive."

Josh Ragosin, a second-year political science major, said Luf's talk helped bridge the gaps in his understanding of Israel's electoral system, a topic he said he enjoys studying.

"I like the fact that Israel has a very unique electoral system," Ragosin said.

"Personally I wouldn't choose it for a country. I think it creates more problems than it's good for, in terms of instability and confusion," he said. "I guess it really depends on what you grew up with."

Lorne Geller, vice-president of Carleton's IAC branch, said he was particularly captivated by Luf's characterization of the process that takes place following the election itself, in which one party is tasked by the country's president with forming the next coalition.

"Once the election is over, it's really just starting," Geller said.

"I very much liked how Mr. Luf came and put the Israeli flair into telling us how it all goes down," he said. "[Israel's] such a small country, but a major player on an international scale. This [election] is going to get huge coverage, and there are so many parties. It's so confusing, and it's just fascinating to observe."

Study shows breastfeeding reduces obesity risk

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

It's no secret that breastfeeding is good for babies. But it may also reduce their risk of obesity later in life.

That's according to a recent study by researchers at Mount Sinai's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, published Nov. 15, 2012, in the International Journal of Epidemiology.

Dr. Stephen Lye and his team followed children in western Australia from birth to age 14 and discovered that the length of time a baby is breastfed positively impacts the effects of the fat mass and obesity gene (FTO) in young adults. Specifically, breastfeeding can help reverse the effects of that gene variant if a child is exclusively breastfed for a three-month minimum.

The research team noted that girls required a minimum of three months breastfeeding, but boys appeared to need a longer breastfeeding period to have the full effect. They concluded that three-to-six months of exclusive breastfeeding would be the best approximation to affect the FTO gene.

Childhood obesity is a serious problem that may lead to the development of chronic diseases, which will be reflected in increased health care costs.

"This study is one of the first examples of early intervention in the fight against obesity," says Lye, associate director of the Institute in Toronto. "Rather than trying to treat the symptoms later, we're better off trying to prevent them in the first place."

Dr. Stephen Lye

There has been a startling increase in the number of Canadian children with unhealthy weights since 1978, when, according to the Childhood Obesity Foundation of Canada, only 15 per cent of kids were overweight or obese. By 2007 that number had climbed to 29 per cent. Statistics Canada says that today almost one-third of Canadian kids, an estimated 1.6 million kids between the ages of five and 17, are overweight or obese. The foundation notes that most adolescents do not outgrow this problem and many continue to gain excess weight. If current trends continue, it predicts that by 2040 up to 70 per cent of adults age 40 will be overweight or obese.

The FTA gene comes in two flavours: good and bad, Lye explains. "We all have two copies of this gene, but 20 per cent of Caucasians have two copies of the bad variant. Under these circumstances, as an adult, on average you would have three kilos of fat mass more than you might otherwise."

An estimated 70 per cent of Canadian children have at least one copy of the specific variant of the FTO gene responsible for increased BMI and obesity, and that increase can be seen as early as age six.

The first 2,000 days of life – roughly from conception to school age – a child undergoes massive development. "We're understanding that while your genetic makeup controls the overall blueprint of how that development occurs, the environment interacts with it to put children on varying paths that impact their learning, health and social functioning," Lye says.

"Our interest is in how the environment interacts with our genetic makeup, and this study shows that we can modify our genetic blueprints through positive environmental interventions."

While there are other genes associated with massive obesity, they are very rare, Lye adds. "In genetic terms, this gene variant is actually a large contributor to obesity.

"This is one intervention and one gene, but it sets a proof of principal that if we understand more about how trajectories are settled during life, we can develop interventions that enhance how children optimize their full potential."

Special to The CJN

For many generations, most discussion of adoption was avoided. Only in recent years have people talked about it openly.

Eighteen adoptees share their moving adoption stories in Who Am I, Really? (General Store Publishing Inc.), a new book by Diane Koven.

An Ottawa author, Koven is a frequent contributor to the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin, the Ottawa correspondent for The CJN and a certified financial planner.

The book's title is the question that most adopted children ask sooner or later, she says.

In her introduction, Koven, who has two adopted children, says, "I believe from what I've heard over and over again that no matter how warm and loving the adoptive family is, it can't completely take the place of a birth family in a person's heart and mind."

She adds that it was a great personal relief for her to discover that even in the stories that included happy and successful reunions, of both the biological and adopted families, "there seems to have been no damage to the adoptive family relationship."

Diane Koven is the mother of two adopted children.

The adoptees interviewed in Koven's book tell gripping stories. They are males and females from different religious backgrounds, from Canada and the United States, who have searched for their biological families or have been searched for by biological families with varying results.

Koven interviewed, among others, an Olympic champion, a nurse, a farmer, a musician, a "black market" baby and a rabbi who was brought up in a German Christian home. At the beginning of each interview, Koven tells how she came to the individual.

Koven, who has been published in two anthologies, recently appeared at a sneak preview reading of her book in Ottawa.

The Toronto launch of Who Am I, Really? takes place on Feb. 28 at the Lipa Green Centre, 4600 Bathurst St. at 8 p.m.

The launch is jointly sponsored by Canadian Young Judaea Alumni and Camp Kadimah. Proceeds from the event will go toward a scholarship to help a child attend Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia.

Koven's son, Jeremy, an alumnus of Camp Kadimah, will join his mother at the launch in Toronto to share his story.

Koven told The CJN, "I had a tremendous response to my book in Ottawa, and I have already had to reorder more books. Even people without a direct connection to adoption find the stories compelling."

Most of the people Koven interviewed for her book and many others she spoke to told her that on hearing the circumstances under which they were adopted, they were grateful.

"Almost everyone who participated and shared their stories told me that by doing so, it was a rewarding and cathartic experience for them," she says.

Koven says she has always had an interest in the topic of nature versus nurture. "Adoption brings this topic to the forefront," she notes.

Jordanian king tries to restart peace talks

The Times of Israel

Jordan's king warned Monday that the failure to revive peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians was adding to regional tensions.

A statement from the royal palace said King Abdullah II told a delegation from the Washington-based American Israel Public Affairs Committee that regional changes tied to the Arab Spring should "drive" the Israeli government to "embrace peace."

In his talks Monday with the pro-Israel group, the king also called on Israel to stop measures that he said hinder peace efforts, including West Bank settlement construction.

Abdullah urged Israel, the Palestinians and the United States to resume peacemaking efforts. He called for direct talks based on a two-state solution, which envisions the establishment of a Palestinian state.

He said it remained the "only formula" to end the 65-year old conflict.

On Sunday, Abdullah said he would host Israeli and Palestinian peace delegates next month in hopes of getting negotiations back on track, Israel Radio reported, quoting the London-based Al-Hayat newspaper.

In a separate interview with the French magazine Le Nouvel Observateur, the Jordanian monarch said that with U.S. President Barack Obama's inauguration coming up on Jan. 21, and the Israeli elections the following day, he saw a "new opportunity to reach an agreement that we cannot afford to miss."

He referred to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as the "main cause of instability in the Middle East" and emphasized that its solution was a priority for Jordan.

Also on Sunday, the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot reported that the European Union was formulating a new Israeli-Palestinian peace plan to be presented in March.

According to the paper, the goal of the EU plan was to bring about the establishment of an independent Palestinian state based on the 1967 borders, with its capital in east Jerusalem. The report said the EU intended to set a clear timetable for negotiations between the two sides in 2013.

Israeli sources said the EU would like to use the plan as the basis for a regional discussion, which would include the participation of Egypt, Jordan and the Gulf states. Such a move would force Israel to join a pan-Middle East conference or risk being seen as an obstacle to peace, the report said.

"The Europeans cannot force an agreement on us, but they certainly have the ability to embarrass us," a senior Israeli diplomat was quoted as saying. "They are formulating a policy of parameters that will set forth the principles of a future peace agreement, and they will put it on the table."

Hungarian Jews speak up for Roma

JTA

BUDAPEST — The umbrella organization representing Hungarian Jews condemned a leading politician's anti-Roma diatribe.

Zsolt Bayer, a founding member of Hungary's ruling Fidesz party, has drawn fire for a newspaper column in which he likened the country's Roma minority to animals.

"Most Gypsies are not suitable for cohabitation," Bayer wrote in the Jan. 5 edition of Magyar Hirlap. "They are not suitable for being among people. Most are animals, and behave like animals. They shouldn't be tolerated or understood, but stamped out. Animals should not exist. In no way."

Bayer in the past has referred to Jews "as stinking excrement called something like Cohen," according to the World Jewish Congress.

"Each and every statement that stigmatizes a group of people by their origin and ranks them as animals is against God's commandments and the norms of civilized societies," the Federation of Jewish Communities in Hungary (Mazsihisz) said in a statement that called on all Hungarians to speak out against such manifestations of racism.

Justice Minister Tibor Navracsics strongly condemned the article and said Fidesz had no room for anyone "who labels a group of people as animals."

Fidesz spokesperson Gabriella Selmeczi said at a news conference on Jan. 8 that the party would not take a position on the basis of an opinion piece.

Netanyahu said to be eyeing deal with centre-left

Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu prefers to form a coalition with the centre-left parties rather than the haredi and hard-right parties, Likud sources said in a Ma'ariv report published on Monday.

Netanyahu's Likud-Beytenu list of candidates is expected to cruise to an easy victory in the Jan. 22 election, and most Israeli pundits have assumed the right-wing slate will seek to form a coalition with other right-leaning parties such as Jewish Home and Shas.

Benjamin Netanyahu

But an unnamed Likud source was quoted in Ma'ariv saying Netanyahu will actually turn to parties on the centre and left of the political spectrum to create a new government, assuming Likud-Beiteinu garners at least 38 seats.

The source said the move would be designed to help the new government pass a budget, a process that Likud fears could get bogged down if the coalition is beholden to religious parties.

"Netanyahu will prefer to give up the ultra-Orthodox parties, mostly because of the economic policies he will need to bring in, that will include extremely harsh cutbacks," a Likud source said. "With the ultra-Orthodox he would not be able to reach an agreement."

On Saturday, senior Likud minister Moshe Ya'alon said the new government would look to be as wide as possible, opening the door for Likud to partner with rivals from the other side of the aisle.

While Labor party chief Shelly Yachimovich has committed to not join Netanyahu, Tzipi Livni, head of the fledgling Hatnua party, has said she would be open to joining a Netanyahu-led government, provided the nationalist party Jewish Home was not given a hand to determine policy.

Yair Lapid, head of the new Yesh Atid party, has also not ruled out the possibility of joining Netanyahu.

Even the Kadima party, led by Shaul Mofaz, could be a coalition partner, if that party wins enough votes to cross the threshold, the sources said. Kadima, which briefly joined Netanyahu last year to create one of the largest national unity governments ever, stormed out of the government coalition with Likud in a dispute over universal national service.

"It is 99 per cent certain Yair, Tzipi, and Mofaz are [on Netanyahu's list]," the source said.

Only after exploring those options would Netanyahu approach either the haredi or the national religious Jewish Home party.

Current polls show Likud-Beiteinu taking anywhere from 35 to 38 seats, with Hatnua and Yesh Atid hovering around nine to 11 Knesset spots each. Jewish Home is expected to be the third-largest party, with 11 to 13 seats, behind Labor, which is polling at 16 to 18 seats.

The haredi Shas party, expected to get nine to 11 seats and considered by some a natural coalition partner for the Likud, has a keen interest in averting budget cuts that would sorely strain the haredi community, which is disproportionately dependent on state help.

Shas has publicly called on Netanyahu to hold coalition talks to close a deal before the nation goes to the ballot box. However, Likud has steadfastly refused to open negotiations before the elections.

Likud-Beiteinu maintains lead in pre-election polls

JTA

Three Israeli election polls predicted victory by a comfortable margin for Israel's Likud-Beiteinu party in the country's general elections on Jan. 22.

A survey published in Ma'ariv has the party's list led by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu clinching 38 seats, followed by Shelly Yachimovich's Labor with 16 seats and Naftali Bennett's nationalist Jewish Home party with 13.

Shelly Yachimovich

Last month, Netanyahu joined his Likud party to Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman's Yisrael Beiteinu party to unite in a right-wing list for this election.

The Sephardi haredi Shas party received 12 seats in the poll; the secularist Yesh Atid party, led by Yair Lapid, garnered eight seats and Tzippi Livni's Hatnua party got seven. The poll was based on replies made last week by 1,000 voters.

In the poll, the centre-right bloc had 52 seats, not including Shas, which many view as a rightist movement though it has joined both left-wing and right-wing coalitions. The centre-left bloc had 39 seats including the party of Lapid, who, unlike Yachimovich and Livni, has not excluded the possibility of joining a Likud-led coalition.

A poll published in Yedioth Achronot based on the replies of 1,000 respondents and conducted by the Dahaf polling company predicted 33 seats for Likud-Beiteinu; 18 seats for Labor; 14 seats for Jewish Home; 11 seats for Yesh Atid and 10 seats for Shas. In the Dahaf poll, the centre-right bloc has 49 seats compared to the centre-left's 45 seats.

A Smith Research poll published by the Jerusalem Post has Likud Beiteinu leading with 34 seats; Labor with 18 seats; Jewish home with 14; Yesh Atid and Shas with 10 seats each and Livni's party with eight.

The poll surveyed 870 people representing a statistical sample of the adult population and had an error margin of 3.3 percentage points, compared to 4.5 points in the two other polls.

Kadima clinched two seats in all three polls. It received 28 seats in the 2009 elections.

Shas leader suffers stroke

Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, spiritual leader of the haredi Shas party, was discharged from the hospital a day after being admitted for a minor stroke. Yosef, 92, left Hadassah Ein Kerem Medical Center in Jerusalem on Sunday morning. He was ordered to rest for several days. It had been reported that he would remain in the hospital for a few days for observation. Rabbi Yosef, a former chief Sephardi rabbi of Israel, reportedly felt numbness in his hand Saturday morning but wouldn't call a doctor or go to hospital on Shabbat. He became ill in shul and was ordered to the hospital by a worshipper who is a doctor. He has a heart condition and had his third angioplasty in 2006. The stroke came 10 days before a national election.

Tel Aviv mob hit fails

A car exploded in northern Tel Aviv in what police believe was an attempted killing of a mob boss. At least seven people were injured in the Jan. 10 blast. It's believed a motorcycle drove by the car belonging to mobster Nissim Alperon and placed the bomb on the car. Alperon and a passenger in the car reportedly escaped before it went up in flames. The windows of an empty bus driving beside the car shattered. It was reportedly the eighth attempt on Alperon's life in 12 years.

Election ad pulled

The haredi Shas party pulled an election ad that stereotypes immigrants from the former Soviet Union and the conversion process after requests for its ban. Shas shelved the ad on the urging of Elyakim Rubinstein, chairman of the Central Election Committee. He received requests to ban the ad from the Labor party and Jerusalem-based ITIM, which helps Israelis seek conversions, because of its racist overtones. In the ad, a couple is about to get married. The bride is a blonde, stereotypical Russian woman, and the groom is a meek, Sephardi-looking man. A fax machine is set up under the chupah, which the bride says is a gift from Beiteinu, a reference to the Yisrael Beiteinu party. The groom is surprised to realize the bride isn't Jewish, but then a conversion certificate is faxed to her under the chupah from a fictitious Yisrael Beiteinu dial-in service.

Sea of Galilee rises as rain, snow pound Israel

Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

The relentless heavy rain that poured down on Israel last week added 69 centimetres to the level of the Sea of Galilee — including a rise of 14 centimetres in one 24-hour period alone, the Israel Water Authority said.

Amir Givati, director of surface water at the Water Authority's hydrological service, told The Times of Israel that the rainstorm has added an estimated 100 million cubic metres of water to the lake.

The Sea of Galilee, also known as the Kinneret, is Israel's largest source of fresh water.

Though the rains abate by late last week, Givati said the lake would continue to rise, as melting snow from the north fed into it.

Givati estimated Jan. 10 that the Sea of Galilee would take in millions more tons of water, raising it by dozens of centimetres over the next several days.

Parts of the Golan Heights and the Galilee received more than a metre of snow as Israel's heaviest winter storm in decades blew through.

On Jan. 9, the lake's level went up by 16 centimetres.

The enormous amount represents about one-third of the average for an entire year, Givati said, and added that annual winter rain adds about 320 million cubic metres of water to the lake, pushing up the level by around 1.5 metres.

Despite the bountiful rain so far this winter, the Sea of Galilee's level was still 2.4 metres below the high-water mark – 209 metres below sea level – the point when Degania Dam is opened to allow increased water flow into the Jordan River and prevent the lake from flooding the city of Tiberias and other towns along its coast.

Last month, the water level rose by its highest amount for the month of December since 1994.

Meanwhile, Jerusalem remained paralyzed last week as the largest snowfall in 20 years closed roads, trains and buses and schools.

At least 15 centimetres of snow reportedly fell in the centre of Jerusalem, and more fell in the surrounding areas.

Route 1, the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway, was closed for the second time last Thursday morning, after being closed the previous evening for several hours. Route 443 to Jerusalem was also closed for part of the morning on Jan. 11.

Power outages were reported in areas in Jerusalem, most due to trees falling on the power lines. Electric company workers said they were having trouble reaching the problem areas due to road closures.

Jerusalem schools were closed due to the bad driving conditions, as were the city's courts.

Schools also were closed in Dimona and other southern municipalities and in Safed and municipalities in northern Israel due to snow and flooding.

Who gets the house on separation; short leash for pet peeve

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 31 years

Question: My spouse is not Canadian. She still has no status in this country, but I bought a house anyway. Does it automatically become hers too? What happens if we separate? Who would stay in the house?

Answer: The fact that your spouse is not Canadian and has no status is completely irrelevant. She has the same rights under Ontario's Family Law Act as if she were born here.

Let's assume that this was your only asset and you had no debts. Let's also assume that she had no net worth of her own. Once the two of you are married, the equity in the house in which you both resided, even if solely registered in your name, could be divided between you on a 50/50 basis, so long as you both continued to reside in that home until the day you separated.

Then again, a Court may not grant a court order to divide the equity on a 50/50 basis if you lived together for less than five years, particularly if you lived together for a short time, like under one year. Moreover, if your spouse's net worth equalled the same or more than the value of your home combined with the net worth of your other property, then there would be no payment to her whatsoever.

Say, for instance, that when you separated the equity in your home in which you both resided equalled $500,000, but her own net worth totalled $540,000. Well, even though you both lived in the same home registered in your name, her net worth actually exceeded yours by $40,000. She therefore owes you $20,000 to equalize your respective net-worth positions.

The solution appears to be a marriage contract in which she agrees not to make any claims on your house if you separate. But how do you get her out of your house? The Family Law Act makes it clear that, in the absence of violent behaviour, a spouse has an absolute right of possession; i.e. the right to stay in the matrimonial home. A spouse cannot even waive that right in a marriage contract. And if you put the house into someone else's name, you face capital gains tax consequences since only the person living in the house can profit from its sale tax-free under the Income Tax Act.

The only possible solution is for both spouses to consent to a court order by which she must leave in the event of a separation. The Family Law Act appears to prohibit waiving rights to possession only in marriage contracts, not in court orders.

Short Leash for Pet Peeve

Pet lovers treat their pets much like their children. They love them, dote on them, feed them, in some instances bathe and clothe them, even educate them — though obedience classes are more common, and lest costly, than a Harvard education.

Most people who separate or divorce are able to amicably resolve who gets the pets. I once witnessed a case (true story) in which they were unable to do so.

The two parties sat on opposite sides of the courtroom. Each was represented by counsel sporting thick legal briefs worthy of any custody battle. The object of their dispute? A single, solitary — but clearly beloved — cat.

The Judge entered the courtroom in full robes and regalia. However, after the formalities had been dispensed with and he'd learned the exact nature of the case over which he was about to preside, his regal bearing and patience quickly evaporated. "Everybody out of my courtroom!" he barked. "Just get out!"

Obviously, he was either (a) not a cat lover, (b) not sympathetic to an already-overcrowded court system taking on another case of dubious merit, or (c) both of the foregoing.

The moral: better to agree on who gives Felix his kibble than to quibble over his custody.

Canada, Israel discuss new tax treaty

Compiled by CJN Staff

JERUSALEM — Canada and Israel are considering a new treaty for the avoidance of double taxation between the two countries, Israel's Ministry of Finance stated recently.

During their visit to Canada late in 2012, Deputy Minister of Finance Rabbi Yitzhak Cohen and Director of the Israel Tax Authority Doron Arbeli promoted a new treaty. The two men met with senior staffers at the offices of Finance Canada with the goal of promoting economic relations between the two countries, along with co-operation between Finance Canada and Israel's Ministry of Finance, Israel's finance ministry stated in a news release.

The new treaty would set low tax withholding rates and encourage investments in Israel by Canadian residents and investments in Canada by Israeli residents. In addition, the treaty will solve problems of dual taxation that were not resolved in the existing treaty.

The existing tax treaty between the countries, which was signed in 1976, no longer meets the current needs, in light of economic changes and tax changes that have taken place in the countries over the years, the Israeli finance ministry said.

The deputy minister of finance and the director of the Israel Tax Authority's visit was preceded by a visit from a delegation headed by Talia Dolan-Gadish, legal adviser to the State Revenues Department, which discussed the clauses of the treaty with a delegation from Finance Canada.

In other bilateral matters, Yuval Steinitz, Israel's finance minister, suggested the country's next government, which will be installed following elections later this month, will probably consider Potash Corp. of Saskatchewan Inc.'s proposed acquisition of Israel Chemicals Ltd. (ICL).

Potash Corp., a Canadian company, held talks in October 2012 with the Israeli government about raising its stake in Israel's second-largest company by market value from the current 14 per cent. The deal "is not yet under serious discussion" as Israel prepares for general elections on Jan. 22, Steinitz said in an interview with Bloomberg News.

"It will take a few months before we can really discuss it," Steinitz, 54, said in New York. "There are different opinions, but anyhow, I think the next government will have to consider it, if necessary."

Israel Chemicals employees declared a work dispute last month after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met in October with Potash CEO Bill Doyle about the proposed deal. The Israeli government can block takeover bids by using its so-called golden share, allowing the state to prevent a takeover to protect natural resources.

"Two things will be taken into account: the needs and interest of the Israeli company, and more particularly, the interests of the Negev, employment and economic development in the Negev," Steinitz said. The Negev region includes the Dead Sea, from which Israel Chemicals extracts minerals to make fertilizer and potash.

If Potash Corp. successfully acquires Israel Chemicals, it would become the largest producer of potash, a crop nutrient, with control of about 25 per cent of global production capacity.

In an economic forecast, Steinitz recently updated Israeli growth forecasts for 2013 and 2014, saying the economy is expected to expand by 3.5 per cent in 2013 and 3.9 per cent in 2014.

"Assuming the growth forecast materializes, and that it is a realistic forecast that was prepared by the Economics and State Revenues Department and the management of the Ministry of Finance, over the next two years Israel will continue to be the number 1 growth economy among all the countries of the developed western world. We must do our utmost to preserve a policy that continues to reinforce the economy's growth engines, to promote investment and to promote the creation of jobs," Steinitz said.

Israeli exporters celebrated for economic contribution

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — In 2011, Israel's exports totalled $90 billion – a full 40 per cent of the country's GDP that year. That called for a celebration, and last week, President Shimon Peres threw one for some of Israel's most creative and successful exporters.

Eight companies were awarded the President's Export Award for 2011. "The companies you represent," said Peres as he distributed the awards, "reflect the wide range of creativity and imagination among Israeli companies. These awards are a lesson for the next generation as well, showing them the possibilities for their futures."

Awardees included some of Israel's most active exporters and best-known companies. Objet, the Rehovot-based maker of 3D printers, sold $121 million (all figures U.S.) worth of products and services in 2011, 98 per cent of it outside Israel. Israel's Kamada, a pharmaceuticals firm that developed an advanced medication for cystic fibrosis, sold more than $20 million in products in 2011, nearly all of it to the foreign market. And ColorChip, which sold nearly $5 million of optical components and subsystems almost all of it abroad, was also awarded for its high level of exports.

Other winners included a textiles firm from Kibbutz Masuot Yitzhak, a maker of polyethylene sheets for agricultural and industrial purposes from central Israel, and a processor of tehina, which exported $10 million of the sesame paste in 2011.

A special award was given to soft drink machine maker SodaStream. In 2007, Peres said, the company was on the verge of bankruptcy, but by 2011 it was exporting $584 million worth of machines and soda cartridges. And in a sign that the company has really made it, a commercial for SodaStream will be broadcast in this year's Super Bowl. With all that, Peres said, the company maintained its Israeli identity, presenting itself as a "blue and white" exporter in the 45 countries where it sells its products.

Also singled out for a special honour was the Israeli research and business facility, Broadcom, the international technology company. The award was accepted by Broadcom corporate vice-president Shlomo Markel, an Israeli who has been with the company since 2001 and who has been responsible for much of the technology co-operation between Israel and the company. Over the past decade, Broadcom has acquired 10 Israeli companies, and those acquisitions, now R&D labs, have helped develop some of Broadcom's most advanced technologies.

It's companies like Broadcom, Peres said, that are the engine of Israel's economic advancement.

"Israel is today rated as the world's top country in the quality of its research and development," he told the companies' representatives. "You are all an important part of the country's economic success."

Micflikier cracks Team Canada lineup loaded with stars

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

At 28, Jacob Micflikier still has lots of hockey ahead of him, but he doesn't think he's stepping out onto a limb to say his Spengler Cup experience is likely to to be the pinnacle of his career.

Not only did he get to wear the Canadian national team jersey, but he made a team that was loaded with NHL stars in a lockout year. And they won a gold medal.

Jacob Micflikier

Not bad for someone who's toiled doggedly in the minor leagues, hoping for a shot at "The Show."

After six years in the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL) and the American Hockey League (AHL), Micflikier has taken his act on the road, signing with EHC Biel of the Swiss A league. While playing on a line with Boston Bruins' young star, Tyler Seguin, he was asked to play for Canada at the Spengler Cup.

An annual mid-winter tournament first held in 1923, the Spengler Cup brings together top European club teams and a collection of Canadians playing in Europe. This year's collection of Canucks featured many NHL stars.

Micflikier, who has 15 goals and 24 assists for Biel, was part of a Canadian roster that included Seguin, Bruins stalwart Patrice Bergeron, Ottawa Senator Jason Spezza, New York Islander John Tavares, Colorado Avalanche Matt Duchene, Edmonton Oiler Ryan Smyth and San Jose Sharks defenceman Jason Demers, who is also Jewish.

Playing on a line with Duchene and Jason Williams, another ex-NHLer, the trio added speed and energy to an already stacked lineup. Although he didn't get any points, Micflikier generated several quality scoring chances and helped Team Canada to the cup win.

"It was definitely a cool experience," he said on the phone from Switzerland. "These were NHL superstars, not just bump and grind guys."

Generally known for his goal-scoring and puck-dishing abilities, on a team loaded with offensive players, Micflikier was asked "to bring a different element" to the tournament. He and his linemates used their speed and skill to negate the opposition's chances.

"We played well together," he said.

The games were broadcast in Canada, and Micflikier, at 5-8 and 180 pounds, stood out because of his stature and because he generated scoring chances on a regular basis.

"To play with those guys was kind of cool for me… It was kind of a feather in my cap," he said.

With the tournament and the NHL lockout both over, Micflikier is settling back into a regular routine with Biel. So far in his pro career, he's been something of a hockey nomad, playing in Springfield, Stockton, Florida, Albany, Charlotte and Hershey over the past six years.

Life in Switzerland is something else entirely. It's his first trip to Europe, and having his girlfriend and dog with him helps keep him grounded. Language is a barrier, and simple tasks such as shopping are no longer activities you can take for granted.

Still, he's being paid to play hockey, which in of itself isn't half bad. The team provides him with an apartment and car, both free of charge. And his salary is tax-free in Switzerland.

A person could get used to that sort of lifestyle, but it's not the NHL, which has been his dream destination.

Last season it looked for a moment like he was finally getting his shot. After all those years in the minors, the Washington Capitals signed him to a one-year contract. He attended the Caps' training camp, but couldn't crack the lineup. Instead it was back to the AHL, this time with Hershey. In 57 games, Micflikier scored 56 points.

Returning to the AHL this season was always an option, "but in terms of career longevity… staying in Europe is probably in the cards for me," he said.

Micflikier has always put up good numbers wherever he's played. At the University of New Hampshire, he scored 150 points in 154 games, was named assistant captain in his senior year and helped the team win the 2006-07 Hockey East regular season title. Last season, playing for the Bears, he scored 21 goals and added 35 assists in 57 games. The year before, he recorded 61 points (29 goals, 32 assists) in 78 games with the Charlotte Checkers, finishing second on the team in goals and third in points.

Altogether, in 254 career AHL games, Micflikier has registered 182 points (76 goals, 106 assists) and 184 penalty minutes.

At only 180 pounds, Micflikier is certainly on the smaller side of current NHL – or even AHL – forwards. But that doesn't mean he gets pushed around, as his penalty totals suggest. "I've had no problems with physicality in the AHL," he said.

Like other players of smaller stature, he's had to show he can take the rough going, altering his game when needed to be more physical. "I've showed I can handle it," he said.

European hockey has proven to be a bit different from the North American brand of hockey he's used to. Not only is it "easier on the body," but the pace is different. Swiss league players are very good skaters, but things happen more quickly on the smaller North American ice surfaces.

"There are not as many scoring opportunities, and the pace is not as fast as back home," Micflikier said.

The differences haven't hurt his stats: when he played with Seguin, the two were tied for the team lead in points. Micflikier was the playmaker, Seguin the big-bodied guy who had an NHL-calibre shot.

"I found him for lots of opportunities," he said. "When you play with better players, it brings your game up."

Just ask the guys on the Spengler Cup team.

Thorough telling of Rushdie's years in hiding

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

London-based writer Salman Rushdie was happy to sell his novel The Satanic Verses to Viking Penguin in February 1988. But six months after the novel appeared, the Ayatollah Khomeini issued a fatwa against him for his blasphemous insult "against Islam, the Prophet and the Qur'an." Instantly, he became a hunted fugitive – just the sort of nightmarish turn one might expect from a good film noir.

As in a film noir, many of Rushdie's friends deserted him and multitudes of people blamed him for being too free with his artistic expression. Having "vanished onto the front page," as writer Martin Amis put it, he withstood 13 years in hiding, and eventually discovered how to reclaim his liberty. Joseph Anton, A Memoir (Knopf Canada), a record of his life "on the lam," takes its title from the pseudonym he used during that time in homage to writers Joseph Conrad and Anton Chekhov.

An article in the Indian newspaper India Today "was the match that lit the fire," Rushdie recalls. After riots in the streets left dozens dead, The Satanic Verses was banned in India; then the great mullah issued the fatwa. Soon afterward, his wife called and said: "Don't come back here. There are 200 journalists on the sidewalk waiting for you." Thus began his life on the run.

There were real and tangible threats against Rushdie even in Great Britain. Muslim citizens in London and Bradford held mass demonstrations, burned his novel and openly called for his death. Fortunately, Scotland Yard offered him and his family a series of safe houses as well as safe cars with drivers. Deeply offended that the Brits would dare protect the apostate, Iran severed diplomatic relations; Britain retaliated in kind.

Islamic rage and menace seemed uncontainable. One day Rushdie and his driver were stuck in traffic outside the Regent's Park Mosque as the faithful were pouring out of Friday afternoon prayers. "I assume the doors are locked?" he asked, hiding behind his newspaper. There was a click. "They are now," the driver replied. Some British Muslims actually tried to sue Rushdie for blasphemy, and the judge received some threatening letters before duly throwing the case out of court.

In America, the blind sheikh Omar Abdel-Rahman (later jailed for the first World Trade Center attack) complained that if Egyptian novelist Naguib Mahfouz had been properly punished for his book Children of Gebelawi, then Rushdie would not have dared to publish The Satanic Verses. Soon afterward, the elderly Mahfouz, a Nobel prize winner, was stabbed in the neck; he survived.

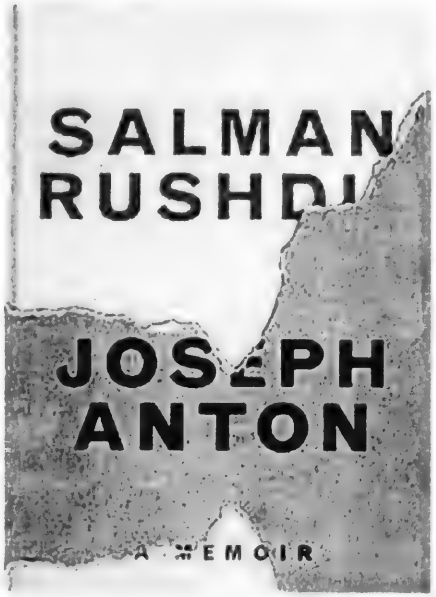
Even while safe in hiding, Rushdie still felt the sting of many knives in his back. The British Foreign Secretary characterized him as a great defamer and writer Roald Dahl called him "a dangerous opportunist." The Daily Mail called him "bad-mannered, sullen, graceless, silly, curmudgeonly, unattractive, small-minded, arrogant and egocentric."

In a pithy exchange of letters with Rushdie in the Guardian, writer John le Carré faulted him and made it seem he deserved everything he was getting and more. "There is no law in life or nature that says great religions may be insulted with impunity," le Carré wrote.

In reply, Rushdie defended his book and refuted the notion "that anyone who displeases philistine, reductionist, radical Islamist folk loses his right to live in safety." After le Carré expressed concern for the safety of the publishing and bookshop staff handling The Satanic Verses, Rushdie replied that "these were the people... who have most passionately supported and defended my right to publish. It is ignoble of le Carré to use them as an argument for censorship when they have so courageously stood up for freedom."

Seeming to bend over backward for the sake of reconciliation, the Pope, the archbishop of Canterbury, the cardinal of New York, the British chief rabbi and many others expressed understanding for the ayatollah's feelings. For a time Rushdie also tried a conciliatory approach, saying he was seeking "common ground" with those whom his book had offended – but it felt false. Later he reverted to standing up for freedom of expression, realizing he could not abandon his own cherished values.

While many people were cowed into silence by the vociferous threats of the Islamists, some defended Rushdie nobly and acted toward him with astonishing generosity, selflessness and courage, he writes.



Bloodthirsty Islamists ultimately murdered the Japanese translator of The Satanic Verses; they also stabbed the Italian translator and shot the Norwegian publisher but both recovered. Although Rushdie was never physically harmed, the added stress broke up his marriage and dramatically curtailed his freedom to live freely, travel, attend public events and see his son.

An important turning point occurred when Scotland Yard seemed to deny him permission to attend an important literary event where he was to receive an award. "You are endangering the citizenry of London by reason of your desire for self-aggrandizement," an agent told him.

For Rushdie, it was a moment of truth: he knew he had to act assertively to regain his life. He calmly explained that he knew where the Dorchester Hotel was and had money for a taxi. "So the question is not whether or not I'm going to the awards. I am going to the awards. The only question you have to answer is, are you coming with me?" Thenceforth Scotland Yard assigned a new senior officer to his case, and he was allowed much more latitude to make occasional surprise appearances in public. Although the fatwa is permanent and may not be lifted, moderates in Iran eventually acted to neutralize it as best they could.

A thorough telling of Rushdie's years in hiding – which he relates in the second person, referring to himself as "he" – Joseph Anton is a great book despite being overlong and overly detailed. At its heart is a clear and essential moral that reflects one of the most important themes of our time: liberty and freedom of expression are universal human rights, not western cultural values alien to the cultures of the East. Another important message: bad things happen when good people stand by and do nothing.

Cultural relativists, apologists for Islamic extremism and anyone who has ever used the deceitful neologism "Islamophobia" – a word that Rushdie defines as a means "to help the blind remain blind" – won't like this book. The rest of us should cheer.

Two Israeli films get best doc nominations

5 Broken Cameras* is one of two Israeli films nominated.

JTA

LOS ANGELES — Two Israeli films are among the five nominated for best documentary for the Academy Awards.

5 Broken Cameras, directed by Emad Burnat and Guy Davidi, and The Gatekeepers, directed by Dror Moreh, were among the films chosen from 15 finalists of the 126 films that entered in the category when the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences announced the Oscar nominees last Thursday.

5 Broken Cameras documents the first years of life for Burnat's baby against the backdrop of the West Bank village of Bil'in's battle against the Israeli security fence. Burnat said five of his cameras were smashed by the Israeli army as he documented friends and family members being shot and injured by Israeli troops. The film won the documentary director's award this year at the Sundance Film Festival.

The Gatekeepers consists of lengthy, and surprisingly frank, interviews with six former heads of Shin Bet, Israel's internal security agency, discussing the past, present and likely future of the tumultuous regional conflicts. Earlier this week it was named the best nonfiction film of 2012 by the National Society of Film Critics in the United States.

Lincoln led the nominations with 12, including for best film and best director. Nominated in their respective categories were Steven Spielberg as director, as well as co-producer (with Kathleen Kennedy), playwright Tony Kushner for best adapted screenplay and Daniel Day-Lewis for best actor.

Mark Boal is up for his original screenplay Zero Dark Thirty on the hunt for Osama bin Laden, while Benh Zeitlin, whose father is Jewish, is in competition as director of Beasts of the Southern Wild.

Israel, whose entries made the top five shortlists of best foreign-language films in four of the last five years, struck out this time with Fill the Void, an insider's view of haredi life in Tel Aviv.

Among the films submitted by 71 countries, five dealt with the Jewish fate during the Nazi era and its aftermath. Though none made the final five, their themes indicate that the Holocaust theme still fascinates international filmmakers.

Quebec director Kim Nguyen's Rebelle is Canada's nomination for best foreign film.

Family Guy creator Seth MacFarlane will host the 85th Academy Awards ceremony in Los Angeles on Feb. 24.

New play examines Canada's role in Afghanistan

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Hannah Moscovitch's play about Canada's involvement in the war in Afghanistan runs at Tarragon Theatre's Extra Space until Feb. 3, 2013.

This is War, directed by artistic director Richard Rose, takes place in 2008, when Canadian Forces are holding Panjwaii, the most volatile region in Kandahar, the birthplace of the Taliban.

The play takes place over 24 hours, and offers four perspectives – from three soldiers and a medic, who are interviewed by an unseen journalist about a critical event.

"Obviously it is very hard to write when you haven't actually been to Afghanistan or to war yourself, and you really can't know what it's like to be in combat," Moscovitch says. "I had good people around me who were those people, I could respectfully ask those questions of."

She says there were a number of events that led to writing this play, which is loosely inspired by two controversial incidents that happened during Canada's highest point of engagement in the Afghanistan conflict.

"I read an editorial in the Globe and Mail by J. Kelly Nestruck, the theatre critic," she explains. "He was ranting that our Canadian playwrights were not writing about Afghanistan and the fact we were at war there in 2008. We were heavily involved and our mission was being extended.

"Then, the theatre department at the Banff Centre in Alberta put out a call for submission for their 75th anniversary for commissions for plays, and I thought I should submit, on the off-chance that one of the superstars of Canadian theatre wasn't planning to submit. In the end of course, they did. Daniel McIvor and Colleen Murphy were both commissioned along with me."

All this happened while she was working on the CBC hit radio drama Afghanada, which put her in the privileged position of having a lot of resources, with war journalists and returning troops coming home from tours in the region, including her high school sweetheart, a military man, who served in Panjwaii and is currently in Kabul.

Although the play is going to the United States, Moscovitch says she wrote it with a Canadian audience in mind and her desire to show us what this Canadian experience was like.

She says she hopes the play will evoke both empathy for our soldiers and an understanding of the complexity of the situation.

Members of the military, including a sergeant who acted as a consultant to the production, have been invited to the play. Moscovitch says she's terrified because they are the most critical audience.

Moscovitch often writes explicitly about Jewish culture and Jewish events, as is evident in her Governor General's Award-nominated play East of Berlin and another work, The Children's Republic.

"Being Jewish, I like plays that ask complex questions and situations, where no right or wrong are clear, where good and evil are both possible, and in the same action. I am a grandchild of the Holocaust and all the moral uncertainty of the Holocaust. I tend to like to write about characters that are extremely traumatized and fight moral complexity."

The Ottawa-born writer, who's lived in Toronto since 2001, is a multi-award-winner, and Canada's most produced young playwright. This is War will be produced in both Chicago and Winnipeg after the Toronto run.

Hannah Moscovitch

The Tarragon playwright-in-residence also has a film project in development with Rhombus Film and House of Film and is writing plays for theatre companies including the Stratford Shakespeare Festival, Prairie Theatre Exchange, Volcano Theatre, 2b theatre, Studio 180 Theatre, Manhattan Theatre Club in New York, as well four plays this year for the Tarragon Theatre – In This World, This is War, Little One and Other People's Children – as part of a mini-festival celebrating her work. She's also working on an adaptation of Ann-Marie MacDonald's internationally acclaimed award-winning Oprah Book Club novel, Fall On Your Knees, for the stage.

On a personal note, she recently became engaged to 2b theatre's artistic director, Christian Barry, and plans to marry during the summer of 2014. It's no wonder this prolific playwright has no time for hobbies.

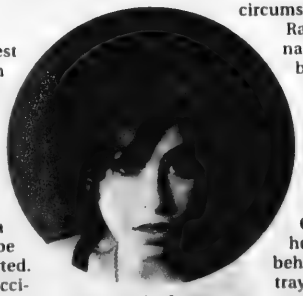
Singer died of alcohol poisoning

JTA

NEW YORK — A second inquest into the death of Jewish musician Amy Winehouse confirmed that the 27-year-old English star died of accidental alcohol poisoning.

Coroner Shirley Radcliffe said the celebrity's tragic end occurred from "alcohol toxicity" and was a "death by misadventure," confirming initial reports from October 2011 of a first coroner who was later found to be unreliable, The Associated Press reported. Radcliffe confirmed the death was accidental and that there were no suspicious circumstances.



Amy Winehouse

Radcliffe said a post-mortem examination on Winehouse found her blood alcohol level to be five times the amount permitted to legally drive — a level that proved to be fatal because a person could "fall asleep and not wake up."

Winehouse attracted global recognition for her 2006 album Back to Black, which won five Grammy Awards. But frequent health problems and unpredictable behavior led the gossip world to portray her as a train wreck rather than a musical talent.

Documentaries recount two very different missions

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

On Feb.1, 2003, the sky over western Texas resounded to two loud bangs as the space shuttle Columbia sped back to earth after a mission in outer space. The highly sophisticated craft never landed, breaking up in pieces in a ghastly vapour trail and claiming the lives of its crew.

Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut, was among the seven astronauts killed that day. A payload specialist and a former pilot, he died a hero, carrying a Jewish artifact salvaged from a Nazi concentration camp in Germany.

Ramon's exemplary life and tragic death are the subject of Daniel Cohen's uplifting 54-minute documentary, An Article of Hope, which will be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society on Sunday, Jan. 20, at 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. at the JCC's Al Green Theatre.

It will be followed by Cohen on the Bridge, a 21-minute animated documentary on Israel's rescue of hostages at Entebbe airport in Idi Amin's Uganda in 1976. Andrew Wainrib's short is both stirring and inspirational.

An Article of Hope, bookended by a fiery tragedy and a renewed space mission, focuses on Ramon, a self-effacing pilot who took part in the audacious 1981 bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor.

The son of a Holocaust survivor who passed through Auschwitz, Ramon considered himself a representative of Israel and the Jewish people, his wife says.

True to his beliefs, Ramon carried with him into space a miniature Torah scroll he received from Joachim Joseph, an Israeli physicist. As a boy in Holland, Joseph was sent to the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, where a Dutch rabbi bar-mitzvahed him in the presence of this Torah scroll.

Ilan Ramon

To Ramon, the scroll was "a payload of history," an item from the past signifying the resilience of the Jewish people through the ages.

The most poignant images in the film unfold in quick succession. The Columbia crew is transported to the launch site in an exultant mood. The astronauts, a mix of men and women, merrily float around in the craft. Ramon shows off the scroll.

The grim faces of the controllers in the Kennedy Space Center attest to the fate of the Columbia as it plummets toward planet earth in a disastrous trajectory, disgorging thousands of fragments, including pages in Hebrew script from Ramon's diary.

An Article of Hope ends on an upbeat note as Canadian astronaut Steve MacLean "finishes" Ramon's mission.

The accompanying movie, Cohen on the Bridge, recounts the Israeli commando raid that rescued more than 200 passengers whose Air France flight had been hijacked by Arab and German hijackers in an attempt to gain the release of 57 "freedom fighters" held in five countries.

In general, except for an introductory episode of brutality set in Nazi-occupied Yugoslavia, the film is told in chronological order.

By using animation, the filmmaker is able to unleash his creative talents in untrammelled fashion. The kinetic black-and-white drawings spring from and light up the screen. But Wainrib also relies on stock file footage of the Entebbe affair to infuse his narrative with vigor and drama.

As he suggests, Israel's daring raid, based on surprise and speed and commanded by the older brother of Israel's current prime minister, seemed like an impossible undertaking.

Uganda was three hours away by air, and the Israeli planes carrying the commandos and their equipment could have been detected en route. And there was no guarantee that the rescue mission itself would be successful.

Ugandan soldiers tried to foil the Israelis and several of the hijackers put up resistance, but Israel prevailed and the raid became a legendary incident in the annals of the Israel Defence Force.

Filmmaker to tell story of Ghanaian Jews

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Gabrielle Zilkha is hoping to bring a group of Ghanaian Jews to Israel for the first time as part of a new documentary called From the Four Corners of the Earth.

It all started two years ago when she was volunteering for a women's rights organization in Ghana's capital, Accra. As the High Holidays drew near, she realized she probably wouldn't be able to celebrate them in a synagogue.

"The thought of finding a minyan of Jews to celebrate the High Holidays was quite unlikely," said the 29-year-old Toronto-based filmmaker. The majority of the population is made up of Christians and Muslims, she explained.

However, her mother did some research and found a group of Ghanaian people called the Sefwis, who thought of themselves as a lost tribe of Israel.

"I had my doubts," Zilkha said, explaining that she figured they were really Christian evangelicals or a group of "Jews for Jesus." When she phoned them to find out about Rosh Hashanah services, she expected to reach an expat or a Christian group. Instead, she reached a Ghanaian.

"I knew they were probably real when he corrected me on the date and time of services for Rosh Hashanah," she said, laughing. So she hopped on a "tro-tro" – a fixed-route shared minibus taxi that Zilkha described as a "Scooby-Doo bus" – and embarked on a nine-hour journey to Sefwi-Wiawso.

"As with most Jews, I was quite neurotic about travelling, and what to expect, and [about] the directions given to me," she said, explaining that she relied heavily on directions from locals. "I'm used to Google Maps, so this was a real leap of faith."

Sefwi community leader Alex Armah leads a Havdalah service.

When she arrived, she was overwhelmed but touched at the warmth she felt in the group.

"I went from being nervous and stunned to supremely touched by the community's hospitality," she said.

There, she learned that the Sefwi had been practising Jewish traditions for centuries before learning that it was part of a bigger religion.

She met with a young community leader, Alex Armah, who said that although people have come into the town and written about them, no one who was actually part of the community ever took part in documenting their culture and history.

Zilkha, who has a background in filmmaking, decided this was something that needed to be fixed, and two years later, she's working on that film with the Sefwi community.

She left for Ghana with field producer and director of photography John Canning to shoot the first part of the film, about the Sefwis' history and culture.

The biggest challenge so far has been the funding, Zilkha said. So far, she has raised just enough to fund the first part of the film through creating a Kickstarter page. Kickstarter, a website that helps creative projects find funding through the public, worked well for this filmmaker. In just under a month, she raised almost $16,000 from 190 "backers," or supporters.

Despite this accomplishment, they still have a long way to go. The second part of the film is likely going to be much more expensive. Zilkha hopes to bring a group of Sefwi community members to Israel for the first time.

"So many of them had mentioned this was a dream of theirs," Zilkha said, explaining in her movie trailer that she wanted to see if they felt the deep connection she felt when visiting Israel for the first time.

The number of travellers would depend on the budget, but Zilkha said she hopes it will be an equal number of men and women from a wide age range. As of now, the community has selected eight people, with the youngest being 14 and the oldest around 60 years old.

She said the Sefwi's isolation from other Jews might explain why they seem so incredibly dedicated to increasing their knowledge of the religion. Armah, who is working as the associate producer and production co-ordinator in Ghana, takes time every Shabbat to teach some of the community how to speak Hebrew. He learned the language in Uganda, where he studied at a yeshiva, Zilkha said.

In the future, he hopes to go to rabbinical school, though it would likely take a scholarship to make that dream feasible, she said.

Zilkha said she hopes the film will answer the questions Jews from around the world might have about these people, she said.

"There's a lot of interesting things that I wish I was able to capture when I was there," she said. For example, she spent one Shabbat in their synagogue, where she spent 45 minutes helping to teach the proper pronunciation for the guttural "ch" sound, which many community members found challenging.

"It's those special moments that show this community as so unique, and also this magic that arrives from the commonality," she said.

Apart from the funding, there is one other major challenge: shooting a film when you don't know the whole story.

"Right now, we know there's a history, a present day, and the future is the visit to Israel," she said. "We're trying to organize the story to make way for this unknown so that you can eventually tell a coherent and beautiful story out of it."

Zilkha said she hopes production will be done by the end of the year, and the film will be released sometime in 2014.

In the meantime, she's working to draw interest and more funding through the Internet. She plans to have the Ghanaian travellers keep video diaries that will be published online so people can keep up-to-date about the journey while still in production.

"We like to share every little step with our supporters, to join us on this exciting journey," Zilkha said.

Sustainable water solutions

"Matchmaker, Matchmaker, make me a match" – famous words from the musical Fiddler on the Roof. Tevye, Golda and their daughters could articulate their needs for a scholar, a rich man or a handsome man, but they would take whatever Yente the Matchmaker would bring them. Right? Of course right! Today, they could turn to successful websites such as JDate and Jewish Friend Finder to find a matchless match.

So, how do you meet a sustainable solution that's a perfect and cost effective match for your business, community or organization's wants and needs? Who plays the role of matchmaker in the cleantech world? Can the process of need articulation and capability matching be improved? Is the "matchmaker" a real person, a virtual community or an automated process? Does the "matchmaker" get paid for his efforts?

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

The videos I described in my last column (Dec. 13) are a way of attracting attention to what's going on in Israel in the area of water. They tell you in general terms what innovative companies in Israel are capable of doing, what they've done for others and the quantified benefits they've achieved.

There are LinkedIn social media "groups" that have a focus on water, such as the ones run by Israel NewTech and Cleantech Israel. Such groups expose people who have joined, or who were allowed to join based on specific criteria, to a lot of advertising, promotion and success stories about various Israeli developed Cleantech solutions. Matchmaking here depends on the off-chance that the people looking for the solution can find or see what they need through the inundation of communications.

There are water-focused trade show efforts such as Watec in Israel and the Canadian Water Summit. These national conferences physically bring together buyers and sellers. They need to generate an audience, both from in the country and out of the country, by creating a program of relevant speakers and the ability to show technology in action. The value of these conferences is that they provide opportunities to set up meetings or to enable ad-hoc meetings to occur as needed.

Cleantech trade missions and symposia such as the ones run by the Province of Ontario in 2010, or those sponsored by the Jewish National Fund that brought Manitoba and Israeli water experts together, physically connected Canadians with water-related needs with various water solutions in Israel.

The recent Water Export Technology Revolution competition gave Israeli companies focused on water an opportunity to highlight their various capabilities. The New England-Israel Business Council, Combined Jewish Philanthropies and five co-chairs from their business communities were then able to put together a productive set of focused meetings in Israel with a selected group of these companies.

David Goodtree, co-chair of the mission and co-organizer of the competition saw the combined information solicitation, competition and trade mission effort as "a way to develop partnerships to advance water innovation globally using Israeli technology and to learn from Israel's enormous success in enhancing its self-sufficiency in the water space."

Ways to match water needs to solutions continue to evolve. Newer and sustainable matchmaking models are emerging. Tevye would be proud.

NEW YEAR'S SOUP

- 1 tbl olive oil
- 2 cloves garlic, crushed
- 1 small onion, chopped
- 2 carrots, peeled, sliced
- 3 leaves collard greens, coarsely chopped
- 1/2 c quinoa
- 1 14.5 oz. can vegetable broth
- 1 15 oz. can black-eyed peas rinsed, drained
- 1 c water
- 1 tbl cider vinegar
- salt and ground black pepper to taste

Heat olive oil in soup pot over medium heat; stir in garlic; cook until it begins to brown. Add onion and carrots. Cook until carrots begin to brown and onion becomes translucent, 7-8 min. Cook and stir collard greens into onion mixture until wilted. Pour vegetable broth and black-eyed peas into pot; bring to boil; reduce heat to low. Cover and simmer soup 20-25 min. While soup is simmering, mix quinoa and water in separate saucepan, bring to boil, reduce heat to low. Cover and simmer until quinoa has absorbed water. Stir cooked quinoa into soup; simmer until collard greens are tender, about 10 more min. Stir cider vinegar into soup to taste; season with salt and black pepper.

Hebrew web columnist Yossi Tastassa notes that even from Canada, Israel's weather (and politics) is interesting.

Sri Lanka is a country that has had its fair share of turmoil and battles. But all that is in the past. There are brighter days in the future. The present and future look like the star sapphires for which Sri Lanka, known as Gem Island, is renown.

They never fail to remind us!

The Torah says over and over that we must embrace the stranger because he is the most vulnerable among us. Within our own ranks, Ashkenazi Jews in Israel and the Diaspora treated Sephardi Jews like second-class citizens when they first arrived because they were easy to kick around and to blame, as they were unaware of their rights and not connected to the land and the culture.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

We create a despicable mythology about the stranger or "the other," as Christians did with us throughout the centuries. We were penny pinchers, kikes and liars. We murdered their saviour, planned a world takeover and had ample time to steal Christian babies and use their blood to make matzah. These lies were rolled down a hill of ignorance by the cracked and soiled hands of psychopathic religionists and politicians. Much work went into reminding "the other" about his insignificance.

But then we established Eretz Yisrael and rooted ourselves in the land. We stopped wandering and reclaimed authorship over our narrative, over our lives. While Egyptian leaders today still say that "Jews are born of pigs, underserving of Israel," we are anchored and able to defend ourselves from the slings and arrows of bogus folklore and fibs meant to deny us our rights and perhaps our lives.

Let them talk.

That is not the fortune, however, of the Roma, the Gypsies. They continue to roam the earth, unable to slough off the mendacities invented about them and the despicable actions that result from such falsehoods.

Medieval Christians accused the Roma of creating the nails used to crucify Jesus, and of stealing Christian babies and eating them. The Gypsy population of Moldavia and Wallachia (now Romania) was enslaved for 500 years, until abolition in 1864. In the 1600s, laws in Germany, Finland and England made "Gypsy hunts" legal. Hundreds of Gypsies were brought to trial in Hungary in the 18th century for cannibalism. Some 200 were executed and then the alleged victims were found alive.

Today, the Roma are the European Union's biggest minority group. There are 12 million Roma scattered across a dozen countries. Their men are labelled "child traffickers." The women are called prostitutes, and their young are considered pickpockets. Gypsies are harassed by neo-Nazi groups. They, just as we were, are dying for safety and security. They, as we were, are begging for the truth.

With all of this, Canadian Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney has said most Roma travel to Canada to exploit social programs, including welfare, subsidized public housing and health care, and then return to their place of origin. He calls their claims bogus. Recently, a "safe country list" was released by Kenney. Hungary is on that list. Roma and Jews applying for refugee status from that country have 30 days to prepare for a hearing instead of the several months they once had. The mythology machine continues to grind and we clutch our wallets, convinced we'll be pickpocketed by these desperate people.

In early January, we sadly discovered in parshat Shmot that the Jewish People were enslaved in Egypt. We were being beaten and humiliated by Egyptian taskmasters who look upon us as "the other." The good news is that Moses will arrive soon to liberate us.

Let us work toward the same for the Roma today. Contact the Roma Community Centre 416-546-2524 to donate and help. Speak to your shul's social action committee to become involved.

We were strangers too, and they never fail to remind us.

"Truly remembering the Holocaust must also be an understanding and an undertaking. It is an understanding that the same threats exist today. It is an undertaking of a solemn responsibility to fight those threats. ...The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem works in the service of a cause of the greatest importance to our country and to the world."

Prime Minister Harper
National Holocaust Remembrance Day Ceremony

To nominate a Holocaust Survivor, please send the Survivor's name, photo, and story (500-750 words) to the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, 265 Rimrock Road, Suite 218, Toronto, Ontario M3J 3C6

Nomination Deadline: February 15, 2013
For more information, email klara@yadvashem.ca or call 416-785-1333.

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem (www.yadvashem.ca)

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem is one of the largest and most prominent societies among Yad Vashem's 28 representative bodies worldwide. The Society supports Yad Vashem's initiatives and implements its important vision across Canada. Through its educational and commemorative activities, the Society carries out Yad Vashem's mission of ensuring that the Holocaust and its lessons are forever engraved in the memory of humankind.

Yad Vashem (www.yadvashem.org)

Yad Vashem, The Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, in Jerusalem, is the universal guardian and imparter of the Shoah's (Holocaust's) legacy and the protector of human values. Visited by more than one million people annually, Yad Vashem is internationally recognized as being at the forefront of Holocaust commemoration, education, documentation, and research.

The National Holocaust Remembrance Day Ceremony

With the enactment of the Holocaust Memorial Day Act S.C. 2003, C.24, and the establishment of a National Holocaust Remembrance Day by the Parliament of Canada, the Government of Canada signaled once more its longstanding commitment to ensuring that the lessons of the Holocaust are enshrined in the hearts and minds of Canadians.

Since that time, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem has had the privilege of leading a Zachor (Remembrance) coalition, a group of organizations committed to Holocaust commemoration and education, in coordinating a National Holocaust Remembrance Day Ceremony on behalf of the Government of Canada.

Canada Post issues Wallenberg stamp

Canada Post issued a commemorative international stamp Jan. 17 in honour of Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat credited with saving some 100,000 Hungarian Jews during the Holocaust. Wallenberg's picture, flanked by a yellow Star of David and a crowd of people he saved, are seen against the backdrop of the Schutz-Pass he created to excuse Hungarian Jews from deportation. Canada Post said it created the stamp to honour Wallenberg's efforts and to extol the "values Canadians share – respect, integrity and justice... His bravery is not forgotten in Canada." Wallenberg was made an honorary Canadian citizen in 1985.

Mali incursion threatens French Jews

JTA

PARIS — France's military involvement in Mali "significantly increases" the threat facing French Jews, the country's Jewish communal security service said.

"The situation requires we raise the level of protection around our community and double the level of vigilance around synagogues, Jewish schools, community centres and gathering places," said a communiqué by SPCJ, which often determines its level of preparedness based on consultations with French authorities.

French ground forces deployed to Mali's capital, Bamako, last week and began advancing northward on Jan. 15 to engage Islamist rebels. French President François Hollande says the rebels are "terrorists."

The incursion caused "agitation" in Islamic circles in France, SPCJ said.

SPCJ also reported four antisemitic incidents that took place over the past four weeks.

On Jan. 11, a bearded man wearing military-style gear intimidated schoolchildren visiting Paris' main Holocaust memorial. Wielding a knife, he shouted at the children "to leave Palestine alone," the report said. Police patrols were called to the area but arrived after the man had left.

A similar incident occurred on Dec. 20, SPCJ reported, when a tall, bearded man in his 40s interrupted a memorial service for a deceased Jewish man and shouted at the 30 people present: "You are on my land and you are going to pay." The man, who also shouted "Allah hu akbar," was arrested and released shortly after questioning. He was identified as Traore Issa, SPCJ said.

On Jan. 5, "Child killers – Jews to the gas – long live Hitler" was spray-painted on a building in the French capital's 12th arrondissement.

Three days earlier, antisemitic slogans, death threats against Jews and a swastika were spray-painted on a building in Toulouse.

Oliver Has Surgery

TORONTO — Natural Resources Minister Joe Oliver underwent heart bypass surgery Jan. 3. Oliver, 72, the MP for Eglinton-Lawrence in Toronto and the only Jewish member of the federal cabinet, had the operation after a routine checkup found a problem. He's expected to return to work full time in mid-February, his office said last week. He had no previous history of heart problems.

CTV Calls TA Capital

TORONTO — CTV acknowledged it incorrectly reported Tel Aviv as Israel's capital in Jan. 8 reports on winter storms in the region. In a release, CTV News president Wendy Freeman said last week: "Tel Aviv was incorrectly reported as the capital city of Israel earlier this month. CTV News immediately took measures to ensure the correct information was being reported as the story progressed."

WORLD

Survivor Dies

LOS ANGELES — Leon Leyson, the youngest person saved by Oskar Schindler, died of lymphoma Jan. 12 in Whittier, Calif., at 83. Leyson was 13 when he went to work in Schindler's factory in Krakow, Poland. Two of his brothers were killed in the Shoah. Schindler put Leyson's parents and two other siblings on the list of 1,100 Jews, making Leyson's one of the few families he protected. Leyson came to America in 1949 and was a high school educator for 40 years. The father of two and grandfather of four rarely spoke of his wartime experiences until the 1993 release of the film Schindler's List.

Air France Sued

PARIS — A French pro-Palestinian activist sued Air France for not allowing her to fly to Israel to visit the Palestinian Authority. Horia Ankour, 30, says she was taken off an April 15 flight from Nice as she tried to take part in the so-called "flytilla," an attempt by foreign activists to stage anti-Israel protests at Ben-Gurion Airport. A flight attendant asked her whether she was Israeli or Jewish. Ankour said she was neither and was taken off the plane, she said. Ankour said 29 activists were on the plane and 21 were detained at the airport "at the request of the Israeli authorities." The rest were arrested in Israel and deported. Air France said it was complying with a treaty that requires airlines to refuse to fly people "declared inadmissible in the country of destination."

Watchdog Raps Mideast Correspondent

MONTREAL — Radio-Canada's Middle East correspondent has been cited for inaccuracy in one of her reports by the broadcaster's ombudsman.

Acting on a complaint from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), Pierre Tourangeau agreed with the organization that Ginette Lamarche's coverage of Hamas leader Khaled Meshal's Dec. 8 speech in Gaza did not reflect the facts. He concluded that Lamarche contravened Radio-Canada journalistic standards and practices for her "lack of clarity."

Ginette Lamarche

CIJA objected to Lamarche reporting that Meshal said, "Hamas would not recognize Israel as long as the Hebrew state occupied Palestine." CIJA pointed out that he'd actually said Hamas would never recognize Israel and called for the destruction of Israel, declaring that "all of Palestine" should be freed by jihad.

CIJA noted that Radio-Canada's English-language counterpart, the CBC, recorded Meshal as saying, "We are not giving up any inch of Palestine. It will remain Islamic and Arab for us and nobody else. Jihad and armed resistance is the only way... We cannot recognize Israel's legitimacy."

The ombudsman has upheld nine other CIJA complaints against Lamarche since her posting in 2011.

Bloodshed in Pakistan blamed on 'Zionist plot'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Organizers of a protest rally at the Pakistani consulate in Vaughan are being accused of a modern day "blood libel" for publishing a flyer that blames deadly terror attacks in Pakistan on a "Zionist plot."

A flyer publicizing the rally, which took place Jan. 14, states in bold red letters: "Massacre of Shia Muslims… Zionist plot – local and regional extremists hands." A group called Canadians Against Bloodshed appeared to be the sponsor of the flyer.

Jewish and Muslim groups condemned the flyer, while a former Pakistan-based journalist now involved in inter-community dialogue with Jews said Iran was likely responsible for the accusation.

Poster for Jan. 14 rally

"Iranian Shias are behind it," said Tariq Khan, who runs the Weekly Press Pakistan website. "Iran is against Jewish Israel, so they are trying to provoke in each and every occasion against Jews. But Ajmi (non-Arab) Muslims have nothing (to do) with anti-Jewish feeling… Iranians want to promote hate against the Jewish People."

Pakistan has been experiencing bloody terrorist attacks on a regular basis and two weeks ago, a series of attacks killed 116 Shiites and injured 150 in the Pakistani city of Quetta. Lashkar-e-Jhangvi, a banned Islamic group affiliated with the Taliban, claimed responsibility for the Quetta attacks, which took place months before a scheduled election.

The rally at the consulate was to "condemn the Pakistani government for not providing security to its citizens… Long live Shia-Sunni unity – Down with Zionist plots," according to the promotional flyer.

B'nai Brith Canada alerted police in York Region about the protest, warning "the inflammatory rhetoric of the promotional flyer… has the potential to incite hatred and spark violence against the Jewish community in Canada… The lurid nature of the flyer for tonight's event amount to a blood libel that crosses boundaries."

Len Rudner, director of community relations and outreach for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said, "We must always be concerned that there are individuals who still believe in the myth of a Jewish conspiracy. This is nothing new. It is deplorable that so little has changed."

Rudner said it was unclear who was behind the poster and rally. "Canadians Against Bloodshed" seemed to be the group distributing the flyer, but it "appears to have been created for the purpose of promoting the rally," Rudner stated.

CIJA asked police to monitor the event "for any actions or statements that would indicate a need for our community to increase its security preparedness or that could be in violation of the Criminal Code."

Law enforcement officials were believed to have attended, but a call to York Regional Police was not returned by The CJN's deadline.

Morsi's antisemitic comments sad, but unsurprising

It was recently revealed that on Sept.23, 2010, while serving as a key leader of Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, Morsi viciously demonized Jews on Lebanon's Al-Quds TV. "Either [you accept] the Zionists and everything they want, or else it is war. This is what these occupiers of the land of Palestine know – these bloodsuckers, who attack the Palestinians, these warmongers, the descendants of apes and pigs."

According to Reports

PAUL MICHAELS

Morsi's disgusting comments came to light when the Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI) translated and published them in English on Jan. 3. They were picked up by the Jerusalem Post the following day. In the days that followed, no major media outlets in the West reported on this development, leading Jewish American journalist Jeffrey Goldberg to ask the simple question: why the lack of attention?

In his Jan. 14 Atlantic blog, Goldberg drew attention to Richard Behar, a financial reporter at Forbes magazine who, along with a colleague, kept watch of the American media after MEMRI made Morsi's comments public. As Behar recounts: "We gave it seven days to see if any of the so-called 'mainstream media' – a pejorative phrase that too-often obscures more than it reveals – bestowed the hate speech even a few sentences of back-page ink. Nothing."

Behar speculated about this initial lack of interest: "[T]he demonization of Jews is commonplace and de rigueur in the Arab media (although most Americans wouldn't know that because they are not being made aware of it). But what makes this omission in Big Media especially egregious is that Morsi... went even further than genetically pairing Jews with lower beasts."

Calling Jews "descendants of apes and pigs" is, unfortunately, familiar language in broad reaches of the Arab and Muslim worlds. Moreover, extreme antisemitism has been a core element of the Muslim Brotherhood almost since its inception in 1928, with its adoption of anti-Jewish Nazi rhetoric in the 1930s and '40s.

Goldberg offered his own take on the silence: "One possibility is, to borrow a phrase, the soft bigotry of low expectations."

As it turns out, David Kirkpatrick filed a story about Morsi's "virulent" comments for the Jan. 14 online edition of the New York Times (which in turn was followed by coverage Jan. 16 in the Globe and Mail, National Post and Ottawa Citizen). Kirkpatrick pointed out that he had been waiting three days at that point for Morsi's representatives to respond to his inquiries (which they declined to do).

Though he was aware of MEMRI's Jan. 3 translations, what appears to have moved Kirkpatrick to write about Morsi's slurs is Egyptian "satirist" Bassem Youssef's Jan. 11 airing of Morsi's 2010 antisemitic remarks, which, in Kirkpatrick's words, "set up a contrast with [Morsi's] more recent collaborations with Washington and Israel, including the brokering of a ceasefire with Palestinian militants in Gaza." After all, given the perilous state of Egypt's economy, Morsi is desperate for American and western financial assistance.

One of the Morsi clips that Youssef used is particularly jarring: "We must never forget, brothers, to nurse our children and our grandchildren on hatred for them: for Zionists, for Jews." Egyptian children "must feed on hatred; hatred must continue."

As to the wider implications for the Egyptian president, Kirkpatrick said his antisemitic and anti-western attitudes raise questions about Morsi's posture abroad as a moderate and someone who will uphold the peace agreement with Israel. While Morsi's past comments "may be a liability" in the West, Kirkpatrick noted that the opposite reaction prevails in Egypt, where "he faces a political culture at home in which such defamation of Jews is almost standard stump discourse."

For many westerners, such anti-Jewish diatribes exist only in the pages of history. That they are openly broadcast today before an audience of tens of millions in the Middle East seems beyond comprehension, after the Holocaust. Unfortunately, Israelis are all too familiar with this sad reality.

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

"They thought of everything."

Shul official guilty of taking over $46,000

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The former president of the Adath Israel Congregation's brotherhood was sentenced to a 12-month non-custodial sentence for stealing more than $46,000 from the synagogue.

Neil Osak was sentenced to six months of house arrest followed by a six months of curfew for fraudulently taking synagogue funds to pay for personal expenses.

"This offence was a classic breach of trust," said Judge Neil Kozloff of the Ontario Court of Justice. "Community organizations are charitable organizations. Mr. Osak... stole from the do-gooders to address issues in his personal life."

Judge Kozloff largely accepted the recommendations of Crown attorney Rochelle Liberman, who had asked for a 12-month conditional sentence.

Osak "committed a huge fraud and a huge betrayal of trust and he used his position in the synagogue to do it," Liberman said.

Defence council Moshe Micha had asked for a conditional discharge, which would have left Osak without a criminal record. Micha pointed out that Osak had returned all the funds to the synagogue. He argued that Osak was remorseful, his marriage collapsed, he became depressed, and he lost his standing in the community. He also stated that Osak was not likely to be involved in future criminal activity.

At the time of the offence, between August 2008 and September 2010, Osak was struggling financially and took the easy way out. But when arrested, he never denied what he had done and has begun to put his life back on track, Micha said.

He is now working for a seafood processor in Montreal with a responsibility for marketing and business development. A criminal record would make it difficult for him to find work and could jeopardize his current job in Montreal, he said, adding Osak is unlikely to commit another crime.

"He's expressed from the very beginning how ashamed and remorseful he is for what he's done," Micha stated.

Speaking on his own behalf, Osak presented an emotional plea for clemency. He said he took the money when he became pressed by creditors and couldn't pay them. His business had taken a turn for the worse and he was facing expenses of more than $6,000 a month that he couldn't pay. Creditors were calling six or seven times a day. He was finding it hard to get work done.

"It came to the point where I just snapped," he said.

Using blank cheques the synagogue had available for times officials were away, Osak spent the money "for food and the sustenance of my family... I have records to prove where the money went, what it was spent on," he said.

When news of the charges became public, he was shunned by the community. It led to his divorce, as well.

"The whole ordeal cost me my family, my friends. My children don't trust me anymore," Osak said.

Referencing the presence of The CJN in court, Osak said "I'll be persecuted again" and the "stigma" of his actions would follow him.

"This whole thing has ruined me physically and emotionally... I'm in my own jail now. I live in constant fear of being found out for what I did."

"Everything I tried to protect and save, I lost."

Osak said he "took the easy way out" when he became desperate. He is putting his life back together in Montreal, but a criminal record would make it hard for him to get work or be bonded, he added.

"I beg for your mercy, that's all," Osak said.

Remember, and act

It seems somewhat quirky if not actually surreal that the United Nations has implemented a day to remember the Holocaust. For, more than any other international organization, the UN – through its various agencies, commissions and bodies – has been the single most voluble source and the highest profile bully pulpit of Holocaust denial among some of its members as well as calumny, invective, lies and vilification about the Jewish state and the Jewish People.

And yet, since 2006, at the initiative of the UN, Jan. 27 has been set aside as the International Day of Commemoration in Memory of the Victims of the Holocaust. The date Jan. 27 was selected because it was on that day in 1945 that Soviet troops liberated Auschwitz-Birkenau.

How cruelly, cynically ironic, therefore, that those very Soviets who threw open the iron gates of Auschwitz locked behind the iron gates of their infamous Gulag Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat in Hungary during World War II, whose goodness and courage saved some 100,000 Jews from death.

So exceptional and significant was Wallenberg's contribution to humanity that the Canadian government made him Canada's first honorary citizen in 1985. In 2001, Parliament declared January 17 Raoul Wallenberg Day.

In honour of Wallenberg Day last week, Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney noted "As we pay tribute to this brave hero, we remember the unique horror of the Holocaust and rededicate ourselves to combating antisemitism, racism and all other forms of discrimination."

We commend Canada Post for having issued a commemorative stamp in Wallenberg's honour. The visual reminder of Wallenberg's heroism can perhaps be a marker, a reminder for our own commitment to help us become better individuals.

There were others, too, who risked their own lives to save the lives of others in World War II. We must always remember them as we do Wallenberg. To name but a few, they were: Giorgio Perlasca, Giovanni Palatucci, Gino Bartali, Jan Karski and Chiune (Sempo) Sugihara.

Sugihara, a Japanese envoy, saved more than 3,000 Lithuanian Jews during the Holocaust. He explained his actions –his bravery – quite simply and quite poignantly: "I cannot allow these people to die, people who have come to me for help with death staring them in the eyes. Whatever punishment may be imposed on me, I know I should follow my conscience."

Conscience is the starting point. Action is the result.

As Liberal MP Irwin Cotler suggested in his address to the concluding forum of the Raoul Wallenberg Centennial Year at the Swedish Parliament last month, "May Raoul Wallenberg Day be not only an act of remembrance – which it is – but a remembrance always to act."

25 years ago in The CJN

Imre Finta, the first person charged under Canada's new war crimes legislation, appeared in court in Toronto to set a date for his preliminary hearing. Meanwhile, neo-Nazi Ernst Zundel's retrial for Holocaust denial got underway, also in Toronto.

Disagrees with NIF representative

I disagree with the headline "NIF working for Israel's future," (Jan. 3). The New Israel Fund (NIF) isn't working for Israel's future. This non-representative fringe radical leftist organization is seeking to impose its ideology on Israel. I also disagree with several statements made in the piece by its author, Orit Sarfaty, executive director of NIF Canada.

- Israel is not having trouble living up to its original ideals. Israeli society is actually functioning much better today than ever. Every country in the world today has room for improvement.
- The NIF subsidizes controversial fringe organizations that are hurting Israel. The fact that Sarfaty mentions what appear to be non-controversial groups that the NIF supports creates a false and misleading picture.
- North American Jews are not poorly served by the vision of a romanticized Israel. The fact is, Israel is not romanticized. If the NIF cannot take pride in the return and settlement of the Jews into our Land of Israel, that's their problem.
- Young North American Jews do not want their own "authentic connection to Israel." The reality is that for most of them, Israel is not a priority. The vast majority has no interest in "grappling" with a "real Israel."
- The NIF does not work hard to ensure that the next generations will take up Israel's cause. I have never heard of the NIF demonstrating or lobbying on Israel's behalf.

Young North American Jews will only take pride in Israel if they have a strong Jewish identity. If 80 per cent currently go to public school and don't know their religion or history, how does anyone expect them to make a connection to Israel?

Moses wrote down the Torah: Rashi

In Torah from Heaven: The Reconstruction of Faith, the author, Rabbi Norman Solomon, a self-described "skeptical" Orthodox Jew, posits the decidedly unorthodox thesis that the classical doctrine of "Torah from heaven" is a myth and that Moses was not the author of Genesis to Deuteronomy (the Chumash), despite its English translation as the Five Books of Moses ("A book for the thoughtful, 'skeptical' Orthodox," Jan 10).

One of the "proofs" brought to buttress this sacrilegious claim is his interpretation of the word "Torah" in Deuteronomy 31:9. The verse begins, "Moses wrote this Torah…" Rabbi Solomon writes that "this Torah" is not a reference to the Five Books of Moses but to the recording of a specific teaching, or at most a set of teachings, as interpreted by Rabbi Ovadya Seforno. What Rabbi Solomon conveniently leaves out is Rashi's interpretation. Rashi, who all agree was the greatest biblical commentator of all time, says: "When all of it [the Torah] was completed, he [Moses] gave it to the members of his tribe." The commentary on Rashi, Gur Aryeh, explains that even though the entire Torah had not yet been written at this point, the verse is out of chronological order, and it refers to after the Torah was completed. Thus, according to Rashi, Moses wrote down the entire divine Torah we have today.

1,000 missionary groups target Jews

The article "Jews for Judaism goes digital in its fight," (Jan. 10), omitted any reference to Jews for Judaism's counter-missionary website, www.jewsforjudaism.ca, its YouTube channel, its Facebook page at "Jews for Judaism (Canada)" or its Twitter account at Twitter@RabbiSkobac.

Jews for Judaism is dedicated to countering the multimillion-dollar efforts of Christian missionary groups that target Jews for conversion. However, today much of that fight is being waged on the Internet. In order for Jews for Judaism to effectively achieve its goal, we offer free educational programs, materials and counselling services that connect Jewish people to the spiritual depth, beauty and wisdom of Judaism. Therefore, it is imperative that articles focused on the targeting of Jews by Christian missionary group publicize our Internet portals.

Also, your article stated that there are some 180 missionary groups targeting Jews operating in North America. That number is actually more than 1,000. The number of missionary groups targeting Jews in Canada is 180, with almost half of them evangelizing Jews in southern Ontario.

Documentary examines Ilan Ramon's legacy

10th anniversary of ill-fated Columbia mission

Maxine Dovere
JNS.org

Dan Cohen describes Israeli Air Force (IAF) Col. Ilan Ramon, the first and only Israeli astronaut, as "a man used to rising to the occasion."

On Jan. 31 at 9 p.m., Space Shuttle Columbia: Mission of Hope, a documentary directed by Cohen, will air on PBS to coincide with the 10th anniversary of Ramon's death. [The Toronto Jewish Film Festival screened this film last week].

The film, produced by Christopher Cowen with executive producers Tom Hanks, Gary Goetzman and Mark Herzog for PBS, tells the story of the ill-fated Columbia space shuttle and of Ramon. It incorporates NASA archival footage and video shot by fellow crewmember Dave Brown. It was shot on location in Jerusalem, the Kennedy Space Center in Florida and Washington, D.C.

Israel sent one of its best on NASA's fatal Columbia mission: Ramon was 46, an engineer (in electronics and computers), a pilot, married and the father of four. As a combat pilot, he was an integral part of the 1981 raid on the Iraqi nuclear reactor at Osirak. He trained for Columbia at Houston's Johnson Space Center. Officially designated as a payload specialist, Ramon was described by Cmdr. Mike Anderson as "fully integrated with the crew."

Ramon, one of the mission's seven casualties, is the only non-American to receive the United States Congressional Space Medal of Honor (awarded posthumously). He was chosen to be a NASA astronaut in 1997. By 1998, he had begun a rigorous, five-year training program.

"From the moment he arrived in Houston until he lifted off, Ramon went through a transformational change. He came to understand who he was and what he represented," Cohen told JNS.org.

Ramon considered himself a representative of all Jews and all Israelis. Although a secular Jew, as the first Israeli astronaut, he recognized the importance of maintaining Jewish identity and unity.

"I am the son of a Holocaust survivor," he once told Israel Radio. "I carry on the suffering of the Holocaust generation, proof that despite all the horror they went through, we're going forward."

Ramon asked mission commander Rick Husband to provide kosher meals and received rabbinical guidance for Shabbat observance in space.

Among the topics explored in Cohen's film is the kind of things astronauts carry into space. Some carry significant personal items, while others bring items with a larger message. Poems and photographs, letters and legacy accompanied Ramon into space. His wife and children sent personal mementos and letters. Moshe Katsav, then Israel's president, provided a Tanach on microfiche. History travelled, too, in the form of a pencil drawing called Moon Landscape, drawn by 14-year-old Peter Ginz, who was killed at Auschwitz. A kiddush cup, and the flag of the IAF also flew. These things, said then-Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon at Ramon's memorial service, "touched and excited all Jews" and were "a source of pride and united our hearts."

The Israeli astronaut also carried a miniature Torah scroll saved from the Holocaust. The scroll had been given to a boy who celebrated his bar mitzvah in the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. The rabbi who had smuggled the Torah into the camp did not survive, but the boy, and the scroll – the rabbi's admonition to tell the world what happened in that place and the boy's promise – did.

Joachim "Yoya" Joseph, the bar mitzvah boy, became a physicist and was Israel's lead scientist supporting Ramon on the ground. During their work together, Ramon learned the story of the scroll. Went he returned to Houston, he asked for permission to take the tiny Torah saved "from the depths of Hell to the heights of space."

"Ilan felt Yoya's promise deep within his heart and carried it with him deep into space," Cohen said. "Keeping the promise is an important part of the mission of this film."

Mission of Hope is the story of the most diverse shuttle crew ever to explore space.

"Moving tributes like this film remind us all that space flight always carries great risk," NASA administrator and four-time space shuttle astronaut Charles Bolden said. "But fallen heroes like Ilan were willing to risk the ultimate sacrifice to make important science discoveries and push the envelope of human achievement."

For Cohen, Mission of Hope became a personal mission. He sought to tell the story not as tragic, but rather as uplifting.

"When Yoya asked, 'What can I do to help you tell this story?' I did not realize that conversation would lead me down a seven-year path," he said.

Meetings with Gen. Rani Falk at the Israeli Embassy in Washington, with Ramon's widow, Rona, and the other astronauts' families followed.

Overall, making the film took the full 10 years since the Columbia tragedy.

"We had to wait for Rona [Ramon's widow] to be ready," Cohen said. "Raising money was also difficult."

Alex Grobman, historical consultant for the documentary and executive director of the America Israel Friendship League, has great admiration for Cohen. Grobman, who also appears in the production, was called on to verify the historical correctness of the story of the bar mitzvah in Bergen-Belsen, including confirmation that there was actually a Torah at the ceremony.

"Filmmakers rarely care about historical accuracy," Grobman told JNS.org. "Cohen's approach was different – he was meticulous in his research. For him, this was a labour of love."

Israel's first astronaut, Ilan Ramon

"Ilan Ramon was an exceptional man, a charismatic personality who recognized that being part of the Columbia shuttle crew was a transformational experience," Grobman said. "Ramon embodied the best of Israel. One cannot view this film without understanding the depth of his humanity, love of Israel, and responsibility to the Jewish people. Being involved with this production, as a historian, as a Jew, was a great honour."

Space shuttle Columbia, Mission STS-107, launched Jan. 16, 2003. For 16 days, every aspect of the flight and its scheduled experiments was considered fully successful. But as the crew prepared for landing, Columbia exploded and disintegrated. Little was left, either human or material. Among the objects that did survive was Ramon's in-flight diary, virtually intact, and still legible.

"I felt that I am truly living in space," he wrote. "I have become a man who lives and works in space."

The crew of the space shuttle Columbia

The real Israel is messy, just like other democracies

In her new book, Parting Ways: Jewishness and the Critique of Zionism, Judith Butler, a professor at the University of California, Berkeley whose work was supported with grants from the American Council of Learned Societies, the Ford Foundation, and the Mellon Foundation, among others, caricatures Israel, Zionism and the Jewish people. In her introduction – usually the part that a writer pores over most carefully – Butler writes: "By claiming there is a significant Jewish tradition affirming modes of justice and equality that would, of necessity, lead to a criticism of the Israeli state, I establish a Jewish perspective that is non-Zionist, even anti-Zionist, at the risk of making even the resistance to Zionism into a 'Jewish' value and so asserting, indirectly, the exceptional ethical resources of Jewishness."

Gil Troy

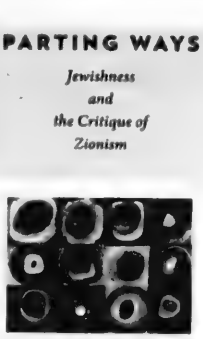
The statement is triply absurd. First, she acts as if she's some kind of Columbus discovering America – wow, Jews have "a tradition affirming modes of justice and equality." Second, she claims those values are antithetical to Zionism. Third, she acts as if "a criticism of the Israeli state" is a novelty and inherently anti-Zionist.

This caricature fits the growing Big Lie on the far left that claims Israel and Zionism are illiberal, anti-democratic and resistant to criticism. I leave it to the philosophers and the psychologists to explain this enduring obsession with Israel and the need to distort the truth about the Jewish state and its founding ideology. But it's important to affirm the true meaning of Zionism as an exercise in liberal nationalism seeking to bring Jewish values alive by implementing them in the Jewish homeland.

At the Shalom Hartman Institute's Engaging Israel project, we talk about Israel as a "values nation." We don't try to claim that Israel is perfect. We don't claim that other nations lack values. We are, instead, trying to continue a Jewish values conversation about Israel, to view Israel as an exciting attempt to develop a Jewish democracy and as a living laboratory implementing Jewish values in sometimes challenging conditions.

In this context, Zionism serves as a powerful, dynamic force for change. Zionism posits that Israel, like all countries, is a work in progress and, like all democratic countries, is in a perpetual quest for self-improvement. Moreover, like the United States and Canada, among others, Israel sits on certain tensions and contradictions. Modern democracies must balance majority rule with minority rights, and individual liberties with collective needs, as well as the desire to inject national values into the public square with the desire to be as open and welcoming to all citizens as possible.



As the only Jewish state in the world, Israel also has a special mission to preserve Jewish culture, to protect Jewish interests and to perpetuate Jewish values. It means that Israel won't have the same kind of separation of church and state that many Americans aspire to have, while being well aware that religion is also a part of the American state. (This porous wall of separation blurs church and state even more so in Canada). So the United States tries to avoid subsidizing any form of religious education, while in Quebec, a religious day school can get money to cover secular studies, and Israel has religious and secular streams in its own public schools.

Each of these three approaches has risks and rewards. American education is facing a values crisis as educators have a hard time teaching values in a western context that's completely cut off from God, religion and other core beliefs. In Quebec, there's a constant balancing act, and, most recently, many religious schools have been chafing under certain government requirements to teach about other religions, following a particular government curriculum – because money often comes with strings attached. Meanwhile, in Israel, haredi and Arab schools take government money without providing the kind of civics and citizenship training a democracy should have in order to raise the next generation of patriotic citizens, even as democratic Israel allows these subgroups to flourish.

Life is complicated. Nation-states are delightfully messy. I don't fear criticism of Israel or of Zionism. But I resent critics who distort and pervert, who caricature and condemn, often in a one-sided way with no sensitivity to the historical record, the enmity of Israel's enemies, or the enduring Israeli and Zionist attempt to improve.

Audience or congregation?

A long time ago, I saw a wonderful one-woman show starring Lily Tomlin called The Search for Intelligent Life in the Universe. At the end of the show, Tomlin confides in the audience that the aliens she befriended were watching them, thinking they were the actual show.

She says, "I feel one of 'em tug my sleeve, whispers, 'Trudy, look.' I said, 'Yeah, goosebumps. You really like the play that much?' They said it wasn't the play gave 'em goosebumps, it was the audience. I forgot to tell 'em to watch the play; they'd been watching the audience! Yeah, to see a group of strangers sitting together in the dark, laughing and crying about the same things... that just knocked 'em out. They said, 'Trudy, the play was soup... the audience...art.' "

I thought of this scene last week while enjoying Teatron's new play Rabbi Sam, the story of a young American rabbi trying to change the world by shaking up a typical, sleepy congregation. His ideas, creative and inventive but sometimes kooky, are held in suspicion. And of course, within moments of his hiring, one of his shul's longstanding board members decides he can't stand the new rabbi and campaigns to get rid of him.

I thought of course that I would relate personally to the character of Rabbi Sam. Luckily, I didn't. My first congregation, Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto, not only tolerated my ideas, but in fact encouraged me to try new things with them. After that, my congregation in Boston, Temple Beth David, not only embraced change, but enthusiastically sought it out. And my new congregation, City Shul, having just been created, doesn't have any "we've always done it that way" naysayers, and just about anything we try is going to be, by definition, new.

Rather, it was the audience I related to. I watched the audience more than I watched the performers. An amazing thing happened: sometime during the second act, the audience turned into a congregation. They were deciding whether or not they, too, liked this new rabbi, and I could feel them judging him not as an actor but really, truly as a rabbi. Was his sermon meaningful? Was he good with the kids? Did he relate to the older folks? Was he inspirational? And when he was just a "normal" guy with his kid, was he still "rabbi" enough for them?

The audience became a congregation at a synagogue in many of the same ways that congregations often feel like audiences at a play.

The guy behind me finished the rabbi's lines for him somewhat impatiently. The woman in the row in front whispered loudly to her companion at several strategic points. And the gentleman a few seats down from me simply fell asleep, snoring with a start every few minutes.

I felt right at home in this congregation. They smiled politely at the "rabbi's" feeble attempts at jokes and shook their heads along with the supposed congregants at his outlandish stories. I think many of them "chose" a board member who was most like them and honed in on that character's feelings for Rabbi Sam.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

Being a rabbi is an often lonely and perplexing profession. We must be compassionate, but strong. Caring but professional. As great with nine-year-olds as we are with 59-year-olds and 90-year-olds. Up to date on the latest issues, but versed in ancient texts. More observant than our congregants, but thoroughly modern in outlook. Committed to Israel, but passionate about our community in the Diaspora.

I can't tell you how many times people have looked into my grocery basket to see what "the rabbi" is buying. And yet people let their rabbi into the most intimate and important moments of their lives – the birth of their babies, the moment their kid becomes an independent teenager, their weddings, their loved ones dying, their mourning and their rejoicing, their simchahs and their sorrows.

So when I stand on the bimah, it's the "audience" sitting together, laughing and crying about the same things, that really knocks me out. Don't worry so much about the "actors" – the folks on the bimah leading the service. Better to start getting goosebumps from the people singing next to you.

Zero Dark Thirty recreates the hunt for Bin Laden

Kathryn Bigelow's taut political thriller, Zero Dark Thirty, a contender for an Academy Award in the best picture category, has reopened a heated debate on the efficacy and/or morality of coercive interrogation methods to extract information from suspects deemed to be terrorists.

The two hour-plus movie turns on the exhaustive manhunt for Osama bin Laden, the spiritual and operational leader of Al Qaeda, the Islamic fundamentalist organization that claimed responsibility for the terrorist events of Sept. 11, 2001.

During that day of infamy, an episode roughly comparable to Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor in December 1941, 19 Arab hijackers recruited and trained by Al Qaeda deliberately crashed three commercial airliners into the Twin Towers in New York City and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., killing some 3,000 people in the worst terrorist incident in American history.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

By way of reaction, the United States invaded Afghanistan – where a reactionary Taliban government had terrorized a nation and where Al Qaeda, its guest, had masterminded the 9/11 plot – and launched a war on global terrorism. Although the United States succeeded in unseating the Taliban, scattering its leaders and giving Afghanistan a new lease on life, it signally failed to find Bin Laden, even as it posted a $25-million reward for his capture and tracked down several of his chief subordinates.

In the intervening years, Bin Laden taunted the United States by releasing a series of provocative videos. Still, he could not be found. But in May 2011, the United States, having ascertained Bin Laden's whereabouts in a fortified compound in Abbottabad, Pakistan, finally exacted vengeance as U.S. commandos shot and killed him in his residence and thereby achieved a measure of closure.

Zero Dark Thirty, which landed in Canadian theatres earlier this month after opening in the United States in December, unfolds over a 10-year period in semi-documentary style and focuses on the manhunt for the fugitive Bin Laden, America's number 1 enemy.

The central character in Bigelow's fast-paced and suspenseful film, Maya (Jessica Chastain), is a smart and obsessive Central Intelligence Agency operative whose search for Bin Laden is facilitated by the detection of his trusted personal courier in the flyblown Pakistani town of Peshawar.

The discovery of the courier was indubitably a factor in solving the puzzle of Bin Laden's disappearance after 9/11. But in retrospect, how important were coercive interrogations?

In Zero Dark Thirty, nominated for five Academy Awards, there are a succession of gut-wrenching scenes in which suspected terrorists are brutally interrogated through a technique known as waterboarding.

Certainly, Dan (Jason Clarke), one of the American interrogators, is convinced it works. As he puts it in an early scene, "In the end, everybody breaks, bro. It's biology." He delivers this in-your-face observation after questioning a suspect whose arms are strung up to the ceiling in a clandestine detention centre, or black site. These sites, which were part and parcel of the CIA's detention and interrogation program, were opened after 9/11 by the Bush administration but discontinued by President Barack Obama shortly after his inauguration in January 2009.

Osama bin Laden

Bigelow and her screenwriter, Mark Boal, who collaborated in the Academy Award winning film The Hurt Locker, do not even imply that torture in and of itself led to the daring Navy Seals raid that sealed Bin Laden's fate.

Nonetheless, three U.S. senators, Democrats Dianne Feinstein and Carl Levin and Republican John McCain, issued a critique of Zero Dark Thirty, claiming it is "grossly inaccurate and misleading" in its suggestion that coercive interrogations gave the CIA the information it needed to nail Bin Laden.

The CIA's deputy director, Michael Morell, levelled a similar accusation, charging that the 157-minute film "creates the strong impression" that torture was the key to finding Bin Laden. "That impression is patently false," he said. "The truth is that multiple streams of intelligence" prompted CIA analysts to conclude that Bin Laden was hiding in Abbottabad, a hamlet close to Islamabad, the capital of Pakistan.

The notion that torture broke the Bin Laden case was, ironically, legitimized by two former high-ranking CIA officials.

Jose Rodriquez, who supervised the CIA's counter-terrorism operations, opined in a Washington Post piece that the hunt for Bin Laden "stemmed from information obtained from hardened terrorists who agreed to tell us some (but not all) of what they knew after undergoing harsh but legal interrogation."

Michael Hayden, the last CIA director appointed by George W. Bush, wrote in a Wall Street Journal article that "a crucial component" of the CIA's data was provided by detainees who had been "subjected to some form of enhanced interrogation."

Zero Dark Thirty, which unfolds to terrorist bombings in Khobar, Saudi Arabia, London, Islamabad and New York City, comes down somewhere in the middle on this issue, which is where the unsullied truth usually lies.

By all accounts, the information gathered by the United States on Bin Laden originated from a variety of sources: the hard slog of field work, wiretaps placed on telephone calls and emails, satellite images gleaned from patterns of daily life in Bin Laden's compound and, last but not least, from coercive interrogations in black sites in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Poland.

In one such centre in Pakistan, Maya, a red-haired, porcelain-skinned, blue-eyed beauty who must overcome implicit sexist assumptions about her resolve, threatens to send a suspect to Israel if he does not cooperate.

The implication here is that he will be treated far more roughly in Israel, where the Supreme Court has sanctioned the use of moderate physical pressure to extract life-saving information from terrorists.

Maya, perhaps a composite of several CIA agents, proves beyond a doubt that a woman can be as tough as a man. Indeed, a colleague describes her as a "killer." In portraying Maya, Chastain exudes grit and grace, qualities that enabled her to win last week's Golden Globe award as best actress of 2012.

Incredibly focused, Maya convinces her superiors that the U.S. homeland can only be protected if Bin Laden is eliminated. She also persuades them that he is holed up in Abbotabad.

The 40-minute raid on his redoubt is realistically filmed in real time and in green-tinted hues as whirring helicopters disgorge commandos wearing night-time vision goggles. They blow up doors, kill a few of its residents and carry away incriminating documents, computer hard drives and a body bag containing Bin Laden's corpse. Bin Laden himself is never fully seen, except quickly in a digital photograph snapped by a commando after his death.

Far from being jingoistic in substance or tone, Zero Dark Thirty tells its story earnestly and in detached fashion, letting viewers reach independent conclusions.

Funeral for murdered couple draws over 1,000

David (Donny) Pichosky and Rochelle Wise

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

A standing-room-only crowd of more than 1,000 people attended funeral services Jan. 14 for a Toronto couple found dead earlier this month in their Hallandale Beach, Fla., condominium.

Police in Florida are investigating the deaths of David (Donny) Pichosky, 71, and his wife Rochelle Wise, 66, as a double homicide.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, said at the double funeral at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, "We are overwhelmed by tragedy, and we are beset with questions."

Earlier in the day, Capt. Sonia Quinones, a spokesperson for the Hallandale Beach Police, said that police were awaiting the medical examiner's report to determine the cause of death and that motive was still unknown.

Wise's son, Jamie, said in a eulogy that he was "confused, frozen, angry, shocked and broken... searching for information, answers, resolution and justice. These questions won't stop, and shouldn't stop, until justice is found."

He recalled his mother's gift for connecting with people and her ability to "inspire, teach, and encourage people to dream... to see the potential within them."

Wise was a preschool administrator at Bialik Hebrew Day School and a founding director of Crestwood Valley Day Camp.

Pichosky, her husband of four years, was a retired businessman who volunteered with seniors at Baycrest, and had spent at least 20 years wintering in Florida.

Jamie Wise said his mother had "truly found her basherт" in Pichosky, whom he recalled as kind and gentle.

Her son read from a note his mother had left for him and his sister, which he said was "not meant to be read for many years."

Mature Zionism:
Criticizing Israel Without Delegitimization
with Prof. Hanan Alexander

Tuesday, February 5th 2013 - 7:30 pm

Beth Tzedec Synagogue, 1700 Bathurst Street

No Admission Fee

Prof. Alexander will explore a more mature approach to Zionism and Israel affairs that can guide public discourse within the institutions and educational programs of Jewish life, as well as society at-large. His approach recognizes that every human society is flawed and that delegitimization does not follow from acknowledging social imperfections.

Hanan Alexander is Professor of Philosophy of Education and Dean of Students at the University of Haifa, where he heads the International School and the Centre for Jewish Education. Educated at the UCLA, Stanford, and the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, Alexander is also a Sr. Research Fellow of the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute. He is the author or editor of seven books and over 120 essays, including Reclaiming Goodness: Education and the Spiritual Quest, which won a 2001 Jewish national book award. He is currently completing Reimagining Liberalism: Affiliation and Inquiry in Democratic Schooling.

Chazzan's role has evolved, cantor says

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

As Shabbat Shirah (the Sabbath of Song) approaches this weekend, Cantor David Rosen wants the community to know that cantors are "much more than just the voice of the synagogue."

Rosen – the president of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim, and cantor and director of youth education at Beth Radom Congregation – told The CJN that cantors want to have more of a presence in the community.

"Our roles have evolved over the years," he said, citing pastoral visits, life cycle events and teaching, in partnership with congregational rabbis, in addition to cantors' more traditional role as singers and prayer leaders.

This year, the approximately 30-member organization is planning its annual concert to raise funds for charity, in conjunction with Jewish day school choirs, he said. "We're reaching out to all generations." Many of his colleagues also do programs at day schools, perform at seniors homes and visit residents there, he added.

Part of that outreach is done by the council, and part of it comes about after Rosen or a colleague receives a request for help with a program.

"I think that music really has the power to transcend generations," Rosen said. "I think we can access people through music, and give them an 'in' to Judaism..., whether seeing us at a concert or a community event, or seeing us onstage.

Another council project involves outreach to small communities, either in the form of concerts or by travelling there for a Shabbat, Rosen said. A few years ago, the council held a program in Sudbury, and a concert in London, Ont., is in the works for this spring.

The group has also participated in community Remembrance Day and Yom Hashoah services, and would like to become involved in more joint projects with the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

"We're working on a Yom Iyun – a day of study – for rabbis and cantors, and possibly the public, either for Shavuot or before the High Holidays."

100-year-old says what's on her mind

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

At 100 years old, Rose Wexler says she's in good shape.

"Really, the only thing that is failing is my hearing, and half the time I don't want to hear what people have to say anyway," she said in an interview at her Don Mills condominium, where she lives with her caregiver.

She still likes to cook, she said, "but since I pay for the [caregiver], she should do the work. I taught her to make chicken soup, fricassee and roast chicken."

Born in Toronto on Jan. 3, 1913, Wexler, has two children, five grandchildren, and four great-grandchildren. "I don't like to brag about what they do. It's how they turned out that count, and they all turned out well. They come to visit me often."

She told a joke about three Jewish mothers bragging about their children.

"One woman said her son is an [accountant], one said her son is a lawyer and another said that her four-year-old will become a doctor."

But seriously, she said, "education is important. It leads you to the right place."

Wexler said music has always played a big part in her life.

"I play the piano, and I taught it for years. I was a strict teacher. If I didn't like the way a student talked to me, they were finished. I was popular, though, and had a waiting list. I still hear from some of my students. Now, I'm teaching my great-grandchild to play," she said.

"Music is important. It has kept me busy and kept me going. I sang for the Holy Blossom [Temple] choir for 30 years, and we even went to Israel to sing."

She said she likes to stay occupied.

"Keeping busy is what keeps people young. I never sit around and do nothing. I'm up at 8 a.m. every day and in the shower. By 9 a.m., I'm ready to start my day. I read the paper or go to the library downstairs and get a book."

Rose Wexler

Even when she wintered in Florida, she did volunteer work, she said. "I couldn't just sit at the beach. I made a lot of friends that way."

She has lived in her building for 32 years, she said, and she has neighbours who check on her and offer to shop. "I don't like to impose on anyone, though."

Wexler said she waits for her family to call her, rather than calling them.

"I don't know when they're busy, and I have nothing to say that can't wait. I try to be independent, and I always say what's on my mind."

Being 100 doesn't mean that much to her, she said. "I'm just glad I liked what I did, and I didn't waste my time. I'm grateful for everything, and thank God for what I have."

Bone marrow donor speaks to parents of the girl he saved

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Jeremy Braverman, 29, a Toronto native living in Chicago, recently had an emotional phone call with two strangers in California.

The man and woman are the parents of Lindsey Krueger, now 18, to whom Braverman donated bone marrow when Lindsey was 15.

Lindsey Krueger

Jeremy Braverman

Braverman registered with the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation, a bone marrow, blood stem cell and umbilical cord blood registry, in 2005, while he was a student at York University.

The school's local Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity chapter had set up a booth on campus, when Braverman, a fraternity member, was a second-year student.

He said that he didn't think about it again until 2010, when he received a call "out of the blue" from the foundation to tell him that he was a potential match for Lindsey, who had leukemia.

Braverman went to New York, underwent a physical exam to ensure that he was indeed a good match, and went on to undergo the procedure.

"The whole process was anonymous, but I knew her details," he said.

A year later, he was called upon again to donate marrow to Lindsey, because her leukemia had returned.

Adam Krueger, Lindsey's father, said that after Braverman donated for the second time, the doctors began an "infusion treatment plan where they would take the donor's cells and infuse them into Lindsey's bloodstream in an attempt to re-activate the fight between the host cells and the donor cells, with the hopeful outcome of eradicating the cells that formed the cancer."

After six months, he said, Lindsey began showing positive signs, and now doctors have taken her off all chemo drugs and have seen no signs of cancer in her system.

"I cannot tell anyone how grateful I am to Jeremy Braverman for his selfless act of kindness for a perfect stranger. I can only hope that more people get tested and matched so that more people can share the same blessings we have."

In a phone interview from California, Lindsey's mother, Maria, said that she had no words to describe the emotions she felt when she spoke to Braverman, who now works for Groupon in Chicago, for the first time about six weeks ago by phone.

"Here was a perfect stranger who saved my daughter's life. She is in Florida now at the Disney College program because she has always been interested in musical theatre. That would not have happened without Jeremy."

Darryl Sittler to play hockey at fundraiser

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Two Canadian winter traditions – hockey and skiing – will be combined in a fundraiser for the Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

Slice the Ice for a Cause, organized by the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, includes two events, On the Slopes for Candy and the inaugural Hockey Night in Toronto.

NHL alumnus Darryl Sittler will play in a special daytime exhibition hockey game on Jan. 27 with the top 20 Hockey Night in Toronto online fundraisers. Afterward, Sittler will party with guests at the Hockey Hall of Fame in Toronto. To play, fundraisers must bring in at least $2,500 individually or $25,000 as a team of 10.

"Having the chance to play hockey with Darryl Sittler is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity," said event co-chair Lawrence Mandel. "Both my co-chair, Jordan Black, and I are very excited about this new event."

Guests at Hockey Night in Toronto will enjoy kosher appetizers and desserts with an open bar. There will be prizes, a silent auction and gifts, together with entertainment and interactive games.

Online fundraisers who bring in a minimum of $1,000 will receive a free ticket to party at Hockey Night in Toronto and a free ticket to ski at On the Slopes for Candy on Jan. 31 at the Alpine Ski Club in Collingwood, Ont. Those who raise at least $500 will get a free ticket to one of the events. Other fundraising incentives include a team photo, personalized autographs and photos with Sittler.

On the Slopes for Candy is a fun-filled day of skiing, snowboarding and snowshoeing, with spa services available for non-skiers. Guests will be driven on a luxury coach to Collingwood, and there will be Scotch tasting and a frozen vodka bar.

On the Slopes was renamed in memory of Candy Schaffel Black, who died after a long battle with cancer. On the Slopes for Candy has raised more than $500,000 since its inception. In 2012, over $75,000 was raised, with proceeds going toward the purchase of an incubator and cardiac monitor to support high-risk infants in the neonatal intensive care unit at Shaare Zedek.

Proceeds from Slice the Ice for a Cause will be used for critically needed medical equipment for the neonatal unit at Shaare Zedek. Approximately five per cent of the 15,000 babies born at Shaare Zedek need intensive medical supervision and treatment provided by the neonatal unit.

Shaare Zedek is in the final stage of a $60-million campaign to complete the construction of the New Generation Building. The building will house a world-class facility to serve the health-care needs of women and children.

Known as the Hospital with a Heart, Shaare Zedek relies on donors around the world, as it does not receive government support for education, equipment or research.

For tickets or for more information about Slice the Ice for a Cause, visit www.slicetheice.ca.

Morsi's comments condemned

Compiled by CJN Staff

Foreign Minister John Baird has condemned the president of Egypt for calling Zionists "bloodsuckers" and comparing them to "the descendants of apes and pigs" in remarks made in 2010 as a leader of the Muslim Brotherhood.

In an interview on CBC's News and Politics last week, Baird said, "I think whenever you hear anything resembling that type of antisemitic rant, it causes us all deep concern. Those remarks were absolutely abhorrent, and obviously the government of Canada condemns any such remarks."

In Washington, White House press secretary Jay Carney also condemned Mohamed Morsi's remarks, made in 2010 but revealed only last week by MEMRI, the Middle East Media Research Institute.

Muslim council condemns Quetta attacks

Khan said that on hearing of the flyer, he contacted several Sunni imams, pointing to "a need to self-searching the root causes within our own ranks. It is too easy to throw the mud on other religions/nations/countries."

Khan said three imams called him back "and their remarks were very positive."

Meanwhile, the Council of Muslims Facing Tomorrow (CMFT) condemned the Quetta attacks, laying the blame with the Lashar-e-Jhangvi and the Sipahi-e-Sahaba.

"These notorious Sunni militias are criminal terrorist organizations secretly funded by the intelligence wing of the Pakistani military," the CMFT stated.

"Sadly, and to the horror of most Canadian Muslims, there are Muslims in the community who shamelessly and without any conscience seek to exploit such tragedies, as the one in Quetta, to advance their own subversive agenda in this country.

"It is deeply painful to see how such medieval conspiracy theories persist inside the Muslim community," said CMFT president Raheel Raza. "At a time when the Muslim community faces serious internal issues, it is shameful we continue to find some Muslims who place blames on others for Muslim failings. Painful as it is, the time is long past to keep denying we Muslims and no one else are the authors of our own misfortune. Fantasizing over such ridiculous ideas that there is a 'Zionist plot' serves only to deepen our self-inflicted misery, to avoid learning any lesson from our past history, and in refusing to be responsible for our present, deny any hope for our future."

Khan, whose news website is read by thousands of Pakistani journalists, said, "In Pakistan, neither the government nor any other organization believes it was done by Zionists, Israel or Mossad. They believe it was done by Indian intelligence agencies and Russian intelligence agencies."

Nevertheless, at the end of last week, the Daily Ummat newspaper ran a story which, when translated from Urdu, was headlined: "Security agencies in Pakistan arrest a Mossad operative from Lahore."

The article claims the alleged agent had been held for 2-1/2 years in Guantanamo Bay, where he was brainwashed. "After that, he was sent to Afghanistan, where he was specially trained to plan terrorism. And finally, he was sent back to Pakistan."

Relying on unnamed "credible sources," the article states the alleged agent's home contained a large cache of weapons, maps of sensitive areas and a laptop that showed he had been in touch with people in Israel via email.

"When the culprit was subjected to special interrogation mechanisms, he finally confessed that he was working for Israel's intelligence agency Mossad," the article stated.

Chassidim sue blogger

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A decade-long feud in Outremont between a wealthy chassidic leader and a non-Jewish blogger who chronicles alleged municipal infractions by the chassidic community went to court last week.

Michael Rosenberg, head of the prominent commercial real estate company Rosdev, along with his son Martin Rosenberg and businessman Alex Werzberger, who heads a coalition of chassidic communities, are suing Pierre Lacerte for $375,000 for defamation, harassment and breach of privacy. The case was heard in Quebec Superior Court over four days, ending Jan. 17.

That scheduled time proved insufficient, and the hearing will resume Jan. 30.

The elder Rosenberg, 58, openly charges that Lacerte is motivated by antisemitism, which Lacerte denies, saying he just wants the law applied equally to everyone and is exercising his freedom of speech.

Lacerte lives on Hutchison Street, facing Congregation Gate David, a small Bobover shul that has been there for more than 50 years. The Rosenbergs are leaders of the congregation.

Lacerte, 58, has run the blog "Accommodements Outremont" since 2007, using it to document and comment on perceived violations of the borough's parking, nuisance, building and other regulations.

His chassidic neighbours are a frequent topic, although the question of how often he writes about them came into dispute during testimony.

Since 2003, Lacerte has been photographing alleged violations and presenting these images as evidence on his blog. That's the year the congregation began doing construction work that Lacerte alleges went ahead without a permit.

Developer abandons offer to buy Ottawa shul

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Congregation Beth Shalom's property in downtown Ottawa is back on the market after a local developer walked away from its offer to buy the shul building.

In late 2011, Claridge Homes made an offer to buy the 81,000-square-foot property for $15 million, with a possibility that the price could increase by up to $9 million pending permission from the city to increase the site's density.

The agreement contained conditions. The synagogue, a member of the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues and Ottawa's last major downtown shul, had 120 days after signing the agreement to waive its conditions, which it did.

Claridge had until last week to waive its conditions, but on the final day advised the shul that it would not proceed with the purchase. It didn't give reasons for the move.

"I respect their decision not to proceed," said Ian Sherman, Beth Shalom's president. "They lived by the terms of the agreement. I am not aware that there were any issues, but for business reasons, they chose not to proceed."

The downtown building, which had housed a Jewish community centre and various other Jewish communal offices in addition to the synagogue until a new suburban Jewish community campus was built in 1998, had in recent years been renting space to a number of charitable organizations. Many have already made other plans and have vacated, or are planning to vacate, the building.

That leaves the congregation in a position of being a landlord – which it was trying to avoid – but with fewer tenants and less income. The congregation of 350 families can't afford to maintain the premises and the demographics of the community have changed as well, with most families moving to the suburbs, all of which prompted the decision to sell and move to another area of the city.

The plan remains the same, only the particulars and the time frame are back in flux.

"This property will be sold, and the shul will move. That is the bottom line," Sherman said. "We had several interested parties alongside Claridge when we first put the property for sale, and we have had continued interest during the past year, because developers were aware of Claridge's right to waive conditions," he said.

"Since it has been announced [that Claridge would not be proceeding with the purchase], there has been a significant degree of interest from multiple parties, and I am very confident that something will get done."

One of the options being explored is an amalgamation with Agudath Israel Congregation, a Conservative shul in the city's west end. Talks, however, have not been successful.

"We have called a hiatus on these discussions for a variety of reasons, and I know that many congregants in both synagogues would like to see an amalgamation. It is my opinion that this is a continuing, desirable and favourable option for both shuls and for the community," Sherman said.

"I continue to stay in touch with Agudath Israel and certain of their representatives and am leaving the lines of communication open. For now, my priority is to work on negotiating the sale of our property."

Hamilton park may be named for Wallenberg

Abigail Cukier
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Citizens of Hamilton, Ont., last week held a program to commemorate Raoul Wallenberg Day, which is observed on Jan. 17.

UJA Federation of Hamilton's Holocaust Education Committee and city council, however, hope to eventually honour Wallenberg with a more lasting tribute.

Last month, council agreed to honour Wallenberg, possibly by naming a park within the city for him. Hamilton's public works department is looking into a location.

City councillor Maria Pearson, chair of the city's facilities naming subcommittee, hopes for more than a park naming.

"I am hoping to work with [the culture department] to have some sort of statue instead of just naming a park," Pearson said. "This was one man, a single person trying to safeguard so many people and putting his life in danger to do this. I am not saying he's the only one. I am sure there are others, others we don't even know. But that's why we have to honour the ones we do."

Ernie Mason, who was saved by Wallenberg, spoke to council to help convince them to create a tribute. Mason also shared his story at the Raoul Wallenberg Day event, which took place Jan. 16 at Adas Israel Congregation. The Holocaust Education Committee presented a program that included Mason's personal testimony, a short film, poetry, music and a preview of the Wallenberg stamp, which was released the next day.

Wallenberg saved as many as 100,000 Hungarian Jews during World War II. Often in dangerous circumstances, he handed out a protective document called the Schutz-Pass, featuring the symbols and colours of Sweden, to Jews. At the end of the war, he was taken into Soviet custody. His fate was never discovered and his body has never been found.

Mason was 10 years old in 1944. His father and older brother, Laszlo, were sent to a work camp, where his brother was killed. Another older brother went to Auschwitz, and his older sister lived with a friend, posing as a Christian.

Mason lived with his mother and baby brother near Budapest. They were also posing as Christian and living with a host family. After six weeks, they left so as not to endanger their host family.

His mother headed to the Swedish Embassy, where she had heard they could get citizenship papers. Encountering a long line, she went to the back of the building and a man who spoke German let them inside. He gave them papers and put them in a safe house, where they remained until the end of the war.

Mason later learned that the man was Wallenberg.

"He saved my life. Without him, my children and grandchildren would not be here. Now that the opportunity is here to do something nice in his memory, I think it is very important," said Mason. "Heroes are few and far between, and I think he was one of them."

Mason came to Hamilton in 1949. He and his wife, Dorothy, have been married for 52 years. They have two children and four grandchildren.

Madeleine Levy, co-chair of the Holocaust Education Committee, said she is proud of the committee's nationally recognized education work, but there is no tangible recognition of the Holocaust in Hamilton.

"We thought Raoul Wallenberg could be that lightning rod," she said. "He exemplifies the power of one and is someone Hamiltonians could be inspired by.

"This tribute within the city will also be a testament to all Holocaust survivors who have made Hamilton home and contributed to Canada in many ways. We want to leave a legacy to citizens of Hamilton and ensure the lessons of the Holocaust are not forgotten."

KEEPING JEWS JEWISH

Canadian Jewish community says goodbye to a legend

Despite being small in stature, Norma Cummings, z"l had a huge heart

By Daniel Horowitz

When Norma Cummings passed away on December 20th, 2012, Montreal's Jewish community lost one of its most passionate, enthusiastic and generous supporters.

Although she was small in stature, Norma, the daughter of Louis Reitman, Founder, along with his brothers, of the iconic clothing chain Reitman's, was known by her countless admirers for her enormous heart, and as a unique individual with a passion for life, laughter, community, and most of all, family, which includes her three children, nine grandchildren and seven great grandchildren.

"My brother, sister and I grew up in the late '50s, Montreal," recalls one of Norma's two sons, Richard. "It was an idyllic time. Our sense of life and our sensibilities about life were very much based on growing up surrounded by love and support. By the same token, ours was a home, and a dinner table, where the issues of the day were always present and where matters of social justice were always grist for our mill."

"Who was our mother, and how did she leave such a lasting impact on so many?" asked son, Steven, in the siblings' heartfelt and touching joint eulogy to their mom. "First and foremost, Mom believed in family. No one had our back the way our mom had our back. She believed that holidays, birthdays, happy – but also sad times – were times to be together. Families stay together by respecting and rejoicing in the common threads that bind us. Mom knitted that colourful quilt that was our family, and was vigilant in holding all the pieces together."

And today, in a time when it seems that many families are being divided by life's myriad of distractions, Norma's commitment to family has paid obvious dividends which continue to keep that bond intact today.

"There was no greater expression of this love of family than our home in Vermont where four generations continue to play, laugh and love together," said Richard. "She forged deep relations with us all. When you were alone with Mom, you had the sense that you were the only person in the world. That is why people felt so intensely about her. So many truly loved her."

"Mom was a real force," said daughter Nancy Cummings Gold, who is returning to a graduate degree in Philosophy at McGill University. "People noticed her. She was a beautiful, incredibly stylish woman – one with a very unique and independent style. Heads turned, but she was easy to reach out to. She made people feel comfortable in her presence. Mom loved our dad. She loved him fiercely. He remained her great love throughout her life. Together they built a beautiful home and gave us a wonderful childhood with strong values, a sense of justice and a moral compass. We will carry that with us forever."

Norma enjoying a summer day in 1995

And it's that sense of justice and morality that propelled the three siblings into working for the betterment of the Canadian Jewish community, both as volunteers and as a professional.

Richard is the Executive Director of Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) in Toronto and Steven worked with CIJA and is a Past President of Montreal's Jewish Federation (CJA) and of the city's Jewish General Hospital.

The list of Norma's volunteer and charitable efforts is indeed an impressive one that includes, among others, CJA, Jewish National Fund, Jewish Public Library, Jewish General Hospital, Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, Tel Aviv University, Ben Gurion University, McGill University and Concordia University.

One of Norma's favourite activities, and something that perhaps best personified the woman, took place every Tuesday over the last ten years, when she would invite 20 to 30 women between the ages of 17 and 97 into her home for "Tuesdays with Norma."

"My mother's capacity to engage the world was particularly evident in this Tuesday tradition," said Richard. "And, if you got invited to Tuesdays with Norma, you also got some pretty impressive bragging rights. These women would come, sit, drink scotch, and talk about anything and everything including art, as my mother was quite a talented artist. She was simply a gracious woman and her grace translated into support for the community, for her family, and her friends. She loved to open her home to events that touched her heart and helped others. And our Yontifs were always standing room only. If we had 60 people for any given Yontif at her home, it was not unusual."

"Norma was an active and caring participant in Federation CJA," said CEO Deborah Corber. "Always helpful, positive, and with a sense of humour and grace. She felt a special responsibility to the community, due to her lineage, which transcended beyond financial generosity to incorporate leading by example."

"The passion for, and dedication to community that Norma Cummings demonstrated throughout her life is something that we should all aspire to," said Ted Sokolsky, CEO & President, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "And her legacy of communal involvement lives on today within her children, all of whom play an ongoing role in Jewish life across Canada."

Exciting archeological discoveries

There have been some exciting archeological discoveries in Israel in the last little while. Among them is the famous inscription found at Tel Dan in the northern Galilee featuring the earliest extra-biblical mention of the "House of David." This was a major nail in the coffin of the biblical minimalists, who believe that much of the early history of ancient Israel before the latter part of the first millennium was prefabricated.

Other exciting discoveries include the remains of what may be David's palace. This massive structure was discovered near the crest of the ancient City of David, where the earliest settlement of Jerusalem was found, which has been dated to the dawn of civilization, circa 3000 BCE. Although the identification of this monumental structure as David's palace has yet to be confirmed, it shows that Jerusalem was an important centre and not just a provincial backwater that was the inconsequential home of some insignificant chieftain in the Judean Hills.

A few years ago, an inscribed potsherd dating to the late 11th or early 10th century BCE was found at Tel Qeiyafa, just outside Jerusalem. What made this small piece of broken pottery so important was that the inscription on it supposedly dealt with such humanitarian issues as protecting widows and orphans. Such matters would become a hallmark of Judaism's ethical and moral base. It has been postulated that this inscription may have been part of a coronation decree dating to the accession of Saul. To see these issues emerge so early is amazing and promises to have a major impact on the study of the development of the ethics and morality of ancient Israel.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

The last discovery is especially dear to me, since I had an indirect role in helping to bring it about. This happened when Prof. Michael Chazan, head of the University of Toronto's Archaeology Centre, told me that the centre, with the backing of U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies, headed by Prof. Jeffrey Kopstein, was about to participate in a major new excavation in the Galilee. He asked whether I was interested in helping him out. I jumped at the opportunity.

Thanks to the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies and some generous former students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, we adopted the dig as an ongoing project of the Jewish/Italian Friendship Project, which I helped to initiate with both the Italian and Israeli consulates in Toronto. What was even more exciting was the fact that the excavations at Tel Huqoq produced the most exciting find of the past season: an inscribed and illustrated synagogue mosaic floor dating to the late Roman/early Byzantine period, in the fourth to sixth centuries CE.

On March 14, we will be bringing the charismatic head of the excavations, Prof. Jodi Magness, to Toronto for a free, illustrated lecture, 7:15 p.m., room 400, Alumni Hall, at U of T's St. Michael's College, 121 St. Joseph St.

I look forward to seeing you there.

Gefilte fish, Part 3

Can a humble, ethnic food like gefilte fish become trendy? Cool?

I started to wonder when I saw Gefilte Fish recipes pop up on sites such as Martha Stewart's. In fairness, her recipe was provided by the doyenne of Jewish American cuisine, Joan Nathan. [http://bit.ly/gefilte16] Not to be outdone, the Williams-Sonoma site has a recipe from Michael Solomonov. [http://bit.ly/gefilte17]

Which of these do not belong: Atkins, South Beach, Zone, gefilte? Trick question. They all belong. Can gefilte fish be any trendier now that it has its very own fad diet? It worked for Julian Singer: "Weighing in at a whopping 165 pounds, I decidedly needed to lose about five to seven pounds. After three months eating gefilte fish about three to four times a week at one of my meals – usually for dinner – I was able to shed eight pounds and keep it off." [http://bit.ly/gefilte22]

And if you want to sample a different gefilte fish recipe each day for two months, here's how. The RCFJ Recipe Archive has the classics, plus Leslie's Mexican Gefilte Fish, Marian Burros's Gefilte Fish Loaf and Maryland Spicy Gefilte Fish. [http://bit.ly/gefilte23] At the Jewish-food Gefilte Fish Archives, there's Dilled Salmon, Chilled Terrine and about 40 others. [http://bit.ly/gefilte24]

Here are two suggestion for people who love the idea of eating gefilte fish: Vegetarian Gefilte Fish calls for eggs, onions, carrots, potato, matzoh meal but not a speck of fish. [http://bit.ly/gefilte25] And how's this ersatz gefilte for fish-haters? It looks like the real deal but contains chicken instead of fish! [http://bit.ly/gefilte26]

Just when you thought it was safe to go back in the bathtub... there's a carp swimming in it. Shelly Kling-Yosef's short film, "Gefilte Fish tells the story of a young woman torn between her prenuptial family tradition to kill and prepare gefilte fish versus her sympathy for the live carp swimming in her bathtub." [http://bit.ly/gefilte18] Watch the 10-minute saga online. [http://bit.ly/gefilte19]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Speaking of videos, the Center for Jewish History brought together five culinary gurus to discuss whether the venerable Jewish dish can be adapted for palates that had long dismissed it. Join Israeli chef Omer Miller and representatives of the 2nd Ave. Deli, Kutsher's Tribeca, and Brooklyn's trendy Gefilteria for a lively 50-minute "Gefilte Talk." [http://bit.ly/gefilte28]

And here's an excerpt from the Gefilteria's "manifesto": "Gefilte is about reclaiming our time-honoured foods and caring how they taste and how they're sourced. It is about serving a dish with pride, and not simply out of deference to hollow convention... We of the Gefilteria plan to bring our foods out of the jar and back to the street, to the pushcarts where we began, to the flavours of the people." [http://bit.ly/gefilte21]

A few years ago, the Israeli post office probably did more to get gefilte fish into the mouths of thousands of people than a generation of bubbies. It immortalized the food on a postage stamp with the words "Gefilte fish" written in English, Yiddish and Arabic. The stamp depicts five pieces of fish crowned with carrot slices (along with the ingredients listed below the perforation!) Standing on guard in the top right corner of the stamp, the humble fish grinder. [http://bit.ly/gefilte27]

Everyone is included

Rabbi Geoffrey Haber

A couple brought their child, who is developmentally disabled, to synagogue. As the Ark opened, the little boy blurted out, "Torah." His parents were exhilarated: this little boy, struggling to express himself, used appropriate words in the appropriate context. It was a moment of triumph.

But their exhilaration was short-lived as they were told to take the boy out. Afterward, this couple was told that his outburst disrupted the service and they should not bring him anymore. Angrily, they stormed out of the building and refused to come back. How could they stay in a congregation that treated people with disabilities in such a manner?

Our Torah teaches in Leviticus: "Do not set a stumbling block before the blind." This asks us to help smooth the way for those with disabilities to live as normal a life as possible by removing obstacles from their path. It asks us to show a little sensitivity, understanding and caring; to help our fellow human beings; to live by the dicta "Love your neighbour as yourself" and "All Israel is responsible for one another."

There was a time not long ago when people would spurn those with special needs. Either out of ignorance or fear or because of stigma or awkwardness, people would avoid the issue of disabilities and disabled individuals. But now the quality of life of those with disabilities has a place on the Jewish communal agenda, for those with disabilities are, indeed, a part of the Jewish community.

This is abundantly clear in the Torah. In Exodus, Moses comes before Pharaoh demanding that he let the people of Israel go free. Pharaoh asks: "Who will go?" Moses responds: "With our young and with our old, we will go forth. With our sons and with our daughters, with our herds and with our flocks, we will go." Stridently, Moses tells Pharaoh that the whole community will go forth into the light of freedom.

Our synagogues must be welcoming places for all people, including those with special needs. When Moses tells Pharaoh "everyone" will go and worship God, he means everyone! Further, the Hebrew word for temple literally means "house of holiness," or more commonly, "sanctuary." The Hebrew word for synagogue, literally means "house of gathering." The synagogue must be a sanctuary to all who wish to gather in assembly under its roof, including those with special needs.

Synagogues seeking to welcome those with special needs can be inclusive by making their buildings wheelchair accessible, including the bimah, by having infrared hearing aids to allow the hearing impaired to listen to the service with greater ease and by having large print siddurim for the visually impaired. But the biggest change needed is educating congregants to welcome those with disabilities into their midst.

When we make efforts to welcome all, we, too, can claim: "With our young and with our old, we will go forth." With everyone in our community, we go forth into the light of accessible worship and freedom of religious practice for all who wish to pray, study Torah and perform acts of lovingkindness with us.

Internship at The CJN was a memorable experience

Guest Voice

Taylor Isen

My name is Taylor Isen. I am 17 and have been an intern at The Canadian Jewish News for the past 3-1/2 months. My time here has been an experience that I will never forget. By coming to The CJN offices every day for three hours as part of my co-op class at Thornlea Secondary School, I have learned not only about journalism and newspapers, but also about myself.

When my co-op teacher, Gus Babalis, told me about working for The CJN, I was both excited and nervous. I was happy to find somewhere that could really help me to find my path in life, but I was also a tad uneasy, because I haven't grown up in a very religious household. Yes, my family and I celebrate the High Holidays, but I never felt quite as proud of my Jewish identity as I do after working for The CJN.

Throughout my months here, I've been working on creating blog posts for the newspaper's youth-oriented Heebonics website. I have learned a lot about the Jewish world around me by writing them. I've written a post about Israel's endangered wildlife, as well as one on how people are trying to bring Tel Aviv's high-energy nightlife to Toronto events, to name just two.

Also, I have learned about a writing style that I had never been exposed to in school. It's a more casual kind of writing, one that emphasizes quality over quantity, and the ability to be as descriptive as possible in the shortest amount of space.

The other thing that really made my time at The CJN special was that I was able to get my own pieces of work published in the newspaper. This was very exciting for me, because I felt like readers actually got to hear my voice. This is my third and final article to be published in the newspaper, and I feel blessed that I got this opportunity at the end of my high school career.

I hope that all the people that I worked with at The CJN – copy editors, reporters and web administrators – had as good a time teaching me as I had learning from them. Thank you all!

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Girl meets cousin of bat mitzvah twin

Vicki Tobianah
Special to the CJN

Lilly Zepp a 12-year-old Toronto girl who celebrated her bat mitzvah this past fall, has almost nothing in common with Lily Singer.

Singer, born in Budapest, Hungary, in 1932, never got to celebrate her bat mitzvah.

There's no trace of her or her family after 1944. Her surviving cousin, Henri Levenheck, who now lives in Toronto, only knows that sometime during the Holocaust, they were sent to Auschwitz and never returned.

But the two girls have one important thing that connects them: their first names.

In order to make her bat mitzvah celebration more meaningful, Zepp took part in the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's twinning program, which matches a bar or bat mitzvah child with a child of the same name or birthday who perished during the Holocaust. She was paired with Lily Singer.

This was also one of the very rare times that a relative of the Holocaust victim actually lives in the same city as his or her twin. So in a special ceremony in Toronto on Oct. 25, Zepp got to meet her twin's cousin, Levenheck, who years ago submitted the names of all of his family members who were killed in the Holocaust to the Yad Vashem database of Holocaust victims.

"It's a rebirth, a good feeling that she's not forgotten," said Levenheck, 84. "If not for me, then nobody would know she existed. Her whole family disappeared. Now, after 70 years, her name is remembered."

Levenheck lived with his parents and two brothers in Strasbourg, France, at the time of the war. His uncle, Lily's father, lived in Budapest. He doesn't know much about what happened to them.

"I don't know the circumstances, but I suppose like many Hungarian Jews, only some survived," he said.

Through programs such as its twinning initiative, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem ensures that the memories and stories of the Holocaust never die. Since the program's inception more than 20 years ago, dozens of bar- and bat-mitzvah-aged children have been paired, or "twinned" with a child Holocaust victim.

"They're really adopting the name and the memory and most of them are investing a lot of time and doing research on the Yad Vashem data to try and find out more information about the girl or boy they adopted," said Yaron Ashkenazi, executive director of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

"When you're speaking about six million [Jews killed in the Holocaust], it's a very almost unbelievable phenomenon to understand," he said. "But once you're going to a specific person, a specific girl or boy, then it's a completely different story. Suddenly you see a face."

At the emotional ceremony last fall, Levenheck told Zepp about his family's history, and Zepp was presented with a certificate of recognition for participating in this program. Together, they lit a candle in honour of Lily Singer's memory.

"She's the age of what my cousin's granddaughter would be," said Levenheck. "I want them to be remembered by somebody, somewhere."

Reflections on a gap year in the Holy Land

All across North America, high school seniors are busy deciding where they want to find themselves next September. While many will head straight to university, the idea of spending a year in Israel first has become an increasingly popular option for today's Jewish teenagers.

There are new programs opening all the time, each catering to an ever-broader range of interests, backgrounds and professional tracks. Many of these now offer up to a full year of college credits as well, and institutions as reputable as Harvard University, Yale University and MIT have begun to actively encourage their students to take a gap year before starting on campus. Today, spending a year in Israel makes more sense than ever before.

It's an option I chose for myself, and an option 30 of my classmates chose as well. Where are we? We're at Bar-Ilan University and Hebrew University, on Young Judea and Nativ, in yeshivot and seminaries and in the IDF.

What are we doing? We're exploring Judaism and studying chemistry. We're volunteering in ambulances and interning with newspapers. We're hiking up mountains, camping in deserts, touring historical sites and meeting some of the greatest politicians, artists and religious leaders in the Jewish world today.

Who are we with? We're with 10,000 Jews our age who have come from 42 different countries to spend this year in Israel, too. (If I ever had doubts that there really are that many of us here, the first Friday morning on Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem promptly put them to rest!)

For myself, I decided to spend the year in yeshiva. Like most people who chose this option, I came with a goal: to solidify my commitment to Jewish values and deepen my connection to the Jewish People.

Guest Voice

Alex Maged

Everything they say about Israel is true. There's no comparing even the best of classes or prayer services back home to the ones found here. If you want to push the limits of what Judaism can be, if you want to give yourself a real chance of finding your avenue to relate to it, then you need to study Torah under its brightest teachers, experience what it means to celebrate the Jewish holidays in the Jewish homeland, and search for HaShem where He's most accessible. This is what I came looking for, and it's what I've found.

But I've found something else, too. You first notice it when, picking up on your accent as you struggle to ask the bus driver which stop you should get off at, seven different passengers chime in to help you with directions. You're reminded of it every time a casual conversation ends with an exchange of phone numbers and an invitation to spend Shabbat. You see it most strongly when the volunteer co-ordinators in the soup kitchen you're helping out at or at the blood drive you're running impose time limits on your group, because there are actually too many people who want to help out and everyone needs to get a chance to give.

More important than Judaism of the head or heart, Israel has shown me Judaism of the day to day. Judaism in practice means that when rockets are falling on kindergartners in Netivot, you cancel your classes and put on a carnival to pick up their spirits. It means inviting teenagers with developmental challenges to join you on your Shabbatons and tiyulim, because they deserve to have fun, too. It means that instead of spending the first day of a new semester in the classroom, you spend it in hospitals and orphanages, putting smiles on the faces of those who are less fortunate. In a word, it means to think beyond yourself, to care for others, to give.

I strongly doubt there can be any experience more valuable than spending a year learning about, and then living out, values such as these – values that should form the foundation of one's identity.

When you leave high school and gain your independence, the natural tendency is to look inwards and begin the pursuit of your own happiness. Taking a year in Israel has helped those of us here frame our newfound freedom with the correct perspective.

Slowly, surely, I think we're learning that real maturity means learning to expand your focus outside of yourself and consider others. We have immersed ourselves in a society whose members, if ideologically divided at times, care for each other with a sincerity that is truly unique. We are training ourselves in an ethical system proven to instil sensitivity, consideration and an appreciation for the value of giving in its adherents.

We're discovering ourselves, but not in a vacuum. We are charting our identity within a national context and religious framework much larger than ourselves. This is what a year in Israel has meant so far, at least to me.

If you're a high school student looking to begin the next stage of your life with an unparalleled opportunity to grow and mature, to cultivate an identity rooted in timeless values, and to forge lasting connections with your people and their land, then a gap year in Israel is something I strongly recommend for you, too.

Alex Maged is a graduate of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. He's currently studying in Yeshivat Lev HaTorah in Ramat Beit Shemesh, Israel.

Provide for yourself a teacher, and acquire for yourself a friend.

~Pirkei Avot

The entire Bialik family is distraught by the tragic loss of our retired Preschool Vice Principal

Rochelle Wise z"l and her beloved husband
Donny Pichosky z"l

Rochelle was an adored member of our community and respected as an outstanding educator and woman of great character and kind spirit.

We extend our deepest sympathy to Rochelle's and Donny's families and hope they find comfort knowing our thoughts and prayers are with them at this most difficult time.

May their memories be for a blessing.

Bialik Hebrew Day School has established a fund in memory of Rochelle and Donny. To contribute, please contact bgurvey@bialik.ca.

A LEADER IN STUDENT TRAVEL

From their first trip across Canada thirty years ago, Westcoast Connection has become a leader in student travel offering over sixty different enriching programs worldwide this summer to teenagers. Active Teen Tours let you explore top destinations and try exciting activities – surf the Pacific, SCUBA dive the Great Barrier Reef and ski the Swiss Alps.

Community Service programs combine volunteering with travel through the United States, South America, Thailand and South Africa. Language Programs help you improve your Spanish or Mandarin using Spain, Peru, Costa Rica or China as your classroom. Pre-College Enrichment programs offer teens a taste of college life in Barcelona or Florence, and a perfect balance of classes (optional university credit), cultural immersion and touring.

Global Adventures are about small groups experiencing challenging adventure – rock climb in British Columbia, travel by backpack in Europe, or raft a 22-foot waterfall in New Zealand. No matter which trip you choose, you'll experience all that Westcoast Connection is known for: innovative programs that build tightly-knit groups and leave you with unforgettable lifelong memories.

CAMP MASSAD MANITOBA – HEBREW SPEAKING, JEWISH FUN

Camp Massad of Manitoba, the only Hebrew immersion overnight summer camp in North America, is now accepting camper registrations for the summer of 2012. World renowned for its unique, innovative, interactive and energetic programming, Massad has been enhancing Jewish life in Manitoba and beyond for more than 60 years.

Camp Massad embraces all campers in a warm, nurturing, safe and fun environment that respects different abilities and fosters confidence, creativity, camaraderie and life-long connections to Jewish culture, history and Israel. All of Massad's programming is designed to bring out the best in every camper and reinforce the sense of community that is a trademark of the camp. At Camp Massad, the spirit of Jewish youth and Jewish life is celebrated in every moment of every day.

Camp Massad offers sessions for children from ages 8-16. The sessions run throughout July and August and are flexible, very reasonably priced and, for younger age groups, shorter in duration than at other overnight camps. Massad regularly attracts campers from across North America, and will make special arrangements to escort out-of-town campers to the camp, just outside of Winnipeg.

Although Hebrew is the working language of the camp, the ability to speak and understand Hebrew is not a pre-requisite for attendance. Every summer, countless children arrive at Camp Massad without any knowledge of Hebrew, and proudly return home from Massad with a basic understanding of Hebrew words and phrases.

Camp Massad's programming staff represent the best and the brightest of Winnipeg's young adult Jewish community. Kind, creative, compassionate, nurturing, dependable, talented, fun and energetic, they ensure that every child is well cared for and every child participates fully in all programs and activities. With a counselor camper ratio of one to four in most cabins, every camper at Massad is guaranteed a positive and unforgettable summer camp experience.

At Camp Massad, every daytime activity and every evening program abounds with laughter, cheers, celebration, song, shtick, and an amazing energy and spirit – known at Massad as ruach.

During the day campers enjoy a wide variety of activities that allow them to express themselves artistically and athletically, meet new challenges, learn new skills and games, and make lifelong friends. These include swimming, kayaking, tennis, basketball, flag football, scouting, singing, drama, dance, music, drumming, movie-making, and arts and crafts, as well as special Israel focused programming and interactive camp-wide games. Daily tefillah, Shabbat and Havdallah are integral aspects of Massad

In the evenings all campers are immersed in the sights and sounds of Massad's unforgettable multi-age programs – programs that give campers unique opportunities to perform, create, compete, cooperate, and explore new worlds. With names like Yom Shalom, Yom Yisrael, Festival, Carnival, Eurovision, Rikud Zar, Olympiada, Televizia and Meshugarama, these programs are the epitome of fun, excitement and adventure, and truly have to be experienced in order to be believed. Maccabiah at Massad is incomparable, with fantastical worlds emerging from paper and paint, and full-scale theatrical productions putting every camper centre stage.

Massad's advanced camp offers specialized programming for youth ages 14-16. Through its focused activities, creative workshops and myriad opportunities to learn new skills, this excellent leadership training program creates proud and capable future Jewish community leaders.

Camp Massad follows kosher dietary laws, and all special dietary needs are accommodated. Camp Massad employs an on-site health officer and is 10 minutes from the local hospital. Camp Massad is an accredited member of the Manitoba Camping Association.

For further information contact Executive Director Danial Sprintz at 204-477-7487 or at info@campmassad.ca. To get a peek at Massad visit www.campmassad.ca or Camp Massad Manitoba on Facebook. To register on-line go to https://registration.campbrain.com/Portal/Login.aspx?H=massad&G=734

All campers registered by February 15, 2013 are eligible for a $200 discount ($25 for the five day Bisselleh session).

PENNIES FOR ALZHEIMER'S: Liam Pearl, a Grade 6 student at Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School, has created an organization called Pennies to End Alzheimer's. His goal is to raise 38 million pennies, one for each of the 38 million people worldwide suffering from Alzheimer's. He recently told fellow students about his efforts as part of the school's Aleinu program that promotes acts of social justice as part of bar/bat mitzvah celebrations.

Yemen halts funding for its 100 Jews

Gabe Fisher
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — The Yemeni government has cut off funding for the remaining 100-odd members of the country's ancient and internally displaced Jewish community, a Sanaa-based NGO said on Saturday.

According to the Sawa'a Organization for Anti-Discrimination, Yemen has halted housing and basic services allocations for Jews, a move the organization called "unfortunate and unacceptable."

Sawa'a demanded that the "National Reconciliation Government... restore these allocations again [and] provide [Jews] with housing and safe living, as they are considered to be war-displaced."

Most of the remaining Jews in Yemen now live in a guarded compound in Sanaa after they were driven from their homes in Saada by Al Qaeda-aligned anti-government forces in 2007. According to Sawa'a, media access to the compound is restricted, and, in October, several Sawa'a staff members were arrested during an attempted visit.

"The return of Jews to Saada currently is not possible," as such a move would entail "a direct threat to their lives, their safety and security," the organization said.

Sawa'a, in conjunction with the current community rabbi, Yahya Yusuf, was working to restore Jewish property lost to the Al Qaeda insurgents, Israel Radio reported Sunday.

In December, Sawa'a protested the exclusion of the Yemeni Jewish community from a national conference that was meant to promote dialogue between various groups in the civil war-torn country. At the time, it was reported that the organization had issued a report documenting the discrimination against the country's Jews, including their political disenfranchisement and lack of access to jobs and education.

The Jews of Yemen trace their origins in the country to the destruction of the First Temple in Jerusalem, in the year 586 BCE. Geographically isolated from Ashkenazi communities in Europe and Sephardi communities in Asia and North Africa, the small community maintained contact with the outside Jewish world through occasional visits by emissaries and correspondence with rabbis, most notably Moses Maimonides in the 12th century.

The first Yemeni Jews immigrated to Israel in the 1880s, but the largest immigration wave came immediately after the declaration of the state, when some 50,000 Jews were brought to Israel in Operation Magic Carpet during the years 1949 and 1950 by the Joint Distribution Committee.

The few remaining Jews in Yemen have faced deep distrust and persecution as militant Islam has become more prevalent. In the latest incident, in May 2012, mechanic Aharon Zandani was killed by a knife-wielding Al Qaeda operative outside the Jewish compound.

In the wake of the murder, Zandani's body was flown to Israel for burial, accompanied by his family.

Latin American Jewish Congress meets in Venezuela

JTA

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — The Latin American Jewish Congress is holding its plenary meeting in Venezuela "to strengthen the link with a community that has difficulties," according to the organization's executive director.

World Jewish Congress President Ronald Lauder is scheduled to attend the regional meeting in the Venezuelan capital, which begins Sunday, Latin American Jewish Congress executive director Claudio Epelman told JTA.

Latin American Jewish Congress officials were scheduled, on Jan. 22, to meet with Venezuela's vice-president and former minister of foreign affairs, Nicolás Maduro. President Hugo Chavez has declared that Maduro will serve as the Venezuelan president in case he cannot assume his new term in office because of his recurring illness.

Latin American Jewish Congress president Jack Terpins told JTA that he will continue to work to strengthen interreligious dialogue, work with Jewish and Muslim regional communities to use their coexistence as an example to help bring peace to the Middle East, and to support Jewish youth participation in politics through the New Generations program, which already is working in Argentina, Uruguay and Brazil.

During this week's meeting, the organization's agenda for 2013-14 will be set and new officers will be elected.

Argentina will have, for first time, two vice-presidents, one from the Jewish umbrella DAIA and another from AMIA, the Buenos Aires Jewish community centre. Also, for the first time, both Argentine institutions will present a joint paper about the Argentine government's current negotiations with Iran on the 1994 AMIA bombing case, which focuses on advancing the cause in the judiciary field rather than through politics or diplomatic negotiations.

In October 2011, Chavez, an ally of Iran, won re-election, defeating Henrique Capriles Radonski, the grandson of Holocaust survivors. Chavez is currently in Cuba recovering from cancer treatments.

In recent years, the Venezuelan Confederation of Jewish Associations has expressed concern about antisemitic statements in Venezuela's state media and asked Chavez's government to ensure security at the country's synagogues.

The Carmel forest rejuvenates

Ben Sales
JTA

CARMEL FOREST, Israel — The rabbi's yarmulke fluttered in the wind, his hand holding it to his head, as he recited K'El Maleh Rachamim, the traditional prayer for the deceased.

In front of him were 50 guards from a nearby prison. Behind him, a wall displayed the names of 44 prison service cadets, teachers, police and firefighters who died when a bus carrying the cadets was engulfed by the largest fire in Israel's history.

The Mount Carmel fire started on Dec. 2, 2010, and burned for five days, destroying 6,000 acres of northern Israel's Carmel forest. In June, the government released a harsh report criticizing the actions of its agencies during the fire.

But even as the country continues to mourn those who died in the fire, the forest is being reborn. Trees are regenerating on their own, new species are being planted, protection against future fires is increasing and hikers are returning to once-charred trails. Israel's fire services have also grown.

On Jan. 18, for the first time since the fire, families will come to plant trees in the forest in advance of Tu b'Shvat, the Jewish New Year for trees.

Today, the fire area looks like a giant bald spot in the middle of a dense forest of pines and oaks. Rolling hills, with no trees, are surrounded by verdant slopes where the ground is hardly visible. On the empty hills, a few solitary trees have survived. Many of them are black on one side and green on the other, partial victims of the fire.

Closer to the ground are rows of light brown tubes about two feet tall made from a plastic material that looks like cardboard. A few leaves peek out from underneath. These are the oaks, carob trees and Jerusalem pines planted by the Jewish National Fund (JNF), the quasi-governmental organization that helps develop Israel's land and nature and is famous for planting trees across the country.

"Usually, a natural forest you leave to nature," said Omri Boneh, director of Israel's northern region for JNF. "But in the specific environment of the Carmel, if we don't intervene, it will lead to a very dense forest with lower biodiversity and great vulnerability to a future forest fire."

JNF sits on a committee to rehabilitate the forest, along with Israel's Nature and Parks Authority, the Environmental Protection Ministry and the Agriculture Ministry. Formed in 2011, the committee has been able to accelerate its work after being granted a nearly $15-million budget last year.

The committee hopes to turn tragedy into opportunity. The team wants to let the forest regenerate on its own but will intervene in a few ways: thinning out the pine regrowth to prevent future fires from spreading quickly, introducing new tree species and rebuilding hiking trails.

The Carmel forest is rejuvenating after its devastating forest fire of December 2010. [Flash90 photo]

"We're changing the nature of the character of the flora," said Guy Ayalon, the Nature and Parks Authority's northern Israel director. "When they're dense, they are a risk for a fire like the one we saw."

The authority plans to introduce more Jerusalem pines as well as oak, almond, olive and carob trees – all native to Israel and thus, Ayalon explains, in better sync with the environment. Boneh said that a wider range of trees will attract a wider range of wildlife to the forest.

Both men expect the rehabilitation process to take at least 10 years, by which time the newly planted trees will grow tall and thick. In the meantime, Ayalon hopes the government will keep funding the project.

"Forest care needs to happen all the time, and Israel needs to know how to invest in it," he said. "If you do adequate prevention, fires will be rarer and smaller."

Dry Bones

The government, meanwhile, has invested in its fire prevention capabilities, which drew heavy criticism in the Carmel fire's wake. It has united the local fire stations under a new national umbrella agency and invested nearly $100 million in fire equipment and personnel. The funds have paid for new gear for firefighters, an expanded fleet of trucks and, for the first time, a fleet of eight planes dedicated to fire prevention. Each plane can spray nearly 80,000 gallons of water.

Still, Fire and Rescue Service spokesman Yoram Levy said, Israel has a long way to go. He said the goal is to be able to respond to fires within nine minutes. The average now is 14.

The government has promised the service an additional $268 million over five years. But with Israel facing a $10-billion budget deficit this year, Levy suspects that may turn out to be an empty promise.

"Now we're talking about budget cuts, and [members of Knesset] were saying they want to cut us," he told JTA. "They're definitely going to try."

Boneh is happy to see Israel's fire services improve, but says that, in the end, preventing fires like the Carmel is nearly impossible.

"It doesn't matter what we do," he said. "On Dec. 2, [2010], there hadn't been significant rain, the dryness of the soil was extreme and there was wind. If there's a fire, it'll get to that size."

For now, though, Boneh and Ayalon hope to rebuild the forest they saw burn – and to see it last.

"Planting a tree in Israel testifies to our roots in our homeland," Ayalon said. "But you have to make sure that the trees are appropriate to their surroundings."

Netanyahu responds to Obama

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, responding to comments attributed to U.S. President Barack Obama, said Israelis would determine the country's best interests. "Only the Israeli people will determine who best represents the State of Israel's vital interests," Netanyahu reportedly said Jan. 17 on a visit to the Gaza division of the Israeli army. "Over the past four years Israel has withstood tremendous diplomatic pressures. They insisted that we curb our demand for action on Iran; that we withdraw back to the 1967 lines, that we divide Jerusalem – that we stop building in Jerusalem. We fought against those pressures. I will continue to safeguard Israel's vital interests, for its security," Netanyahu said. The comments came a day after Bloomberg columnist Jeffrey Goldberg wrote that when Obama was told Israel had approved plans to advance the development of housing in the controversial E-1 corridor between Maale Adumim and Jerusalem, which Palestinians said would make a two-state solution impossible, "Obama said privately and repeatedly, 'Israel doesn't know what its own best interests are.' With each new settlement announcement, in Obama's view, Netanyahu is moving his country down a path toward near-total isolation."

Hadassah hospital bailout

Hadassah transferred $10 million to Hadassah Medical Center in Jerusalem to help cover its subsidiary's $50-million deficit. The New York Jewish Week reported that the Zionist women's group took the unusual measure after learning of the deficit run up by the hospital, which was founded nearly 80 years ago. Meanwhile, the hospital's director general, Ehud Kokia, submitted his resignation. Hospital board chair, Esti Dominissin, will serve in the role until a replacement is found. National director Marcie Natan said Hadassah would hire PricewaterhouseCoopers, a consultancy firm, to help reduce the hospital's debts.

Tent cities dismantled

Israeli troops dismantled a Palestinian tent city, the second erected in recent days in the Jerusalem area. The soldiers entered the Palestinian outpost in northwest Jerusalem near Beit Iksa on Monday and began to take down the four tents and the structure serving as a mosque. The military used bulldozers to remove the structures, according to a Palestinian news agency. Twenty Palestinian protesters at the site were reportedly removed peacefully. It was the second Palestinian outpost established last week and the second to be dismantled. Israeli troops late last week dismantled one erected in the controversial E-1 corridor between Jerusalem and Maale Adumim. Israeli forces removed some 25 protest tents on land the Palestinians say is necessary to form a state. The removal came hours after Israel's Supreme Court lifted a temporary injunction on dismantling the outpost. The court accepted the government's argument the outpost could lead to a security crisis.

PA minister denies Jerusalem's Jewish history

JNS.org

The Palestinian Authority (PA) recently said that all of Jerusalem, including the Western Wall, has never been used as a place of worship throughout history by anyone besides Muslims "until the ominous Balfour Declaration was issued in 1917."

This directly contradicts a myriad of Jewish and non-Jewish historical sources that indicate otherwise.

PA Minister of Religious Affairs Mahmoud Al-Habbash said Jerusalem and the Western Wall are "the sole right of Palestinians," according to Palestinian Media Watch, in response to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's statement regarding Jerusalem's 3,000-year Jewish history during Chanukah last month. Al-Habbash called Netanyahu's words "worthless from a religious, historical or legal point of view."

The Western Wall is the last remnant of the Second Jewish Temple, destroyed by the Romans in 70 CE. The famous Jewish historian from that era, Josephus Flavius, who lived in Jerusalem, documented the destruction of the city and wrote extensively about the history of Jews in the region during the Antiquities.

"So the Romans being now become masters of the walls. They both placed their ensigns upon the towers and made joyful acclamations for the victory they had gained... they slew those whom they overtook without and set fire to the houses whither the Jews were fled, and burnt every soul in them," Josephus wrote in The Wars of the Jews, according to Project Gutenberg.

The PA, however, teaches that no temple ever existed in Jerusalem as a way to claim that Jews and Israel have no right to Jerusalem or the Western Wall.

In 1871, Abraham Lincoln's Secretary of State, William H. Seward, wrote that in Jerusalem, "the Jews are 8,000 and have the southeast quarter." But the PA minister's statement is the latest of many from the PA denying such history.

"The superfluous [nation] in this region, and the one harming its security and stability, is the occupation [Israel] in all its shapes and stages, whether in the past or in the present, and whether in the form of military occupation, settlement, or fabricating Judaization that have no historical or legal basis," stated an op-ed in the official PA daily, Al-Hayat Al-Jadida.

A WELCOME VISITOR: Former Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit, who was held captive by Hamas for more than five years, recently visited the Friends of the IDF/Nefesh B'Nefesh Lone Soldiers Program in Jerusalem to meet with 50 lone soldiers, those who move to Israel to serve in the IDF from other countries worldwide. The FIDF/Nefesh B'Nefesh program, in collaboration with the Jewish Agency for Israel and Jewish National Fund, assists newly arrived soldiers with their transition into their new lives in Israel and national service. Schalit is seen playing pool with some of the lone soldiers.

Jewish leaders back gun changes

JTA

WASHINGTON — An interfaith alliance that includes Jewish religious and lay leaders is seeking a ban on assault weapons and high-capacity ammunition magazines.

Faiths United to Prevent Gun Violence held a news conference on Jan. 15 calling for the bans, as well as for improved background screening of gun buyers. On what would have been civil rights activist Martin Luther King Jr.'s 84th birthday, the group also urged Americans to work together to help curb gun violence, and spoke of the need to improve the treatment available for people with mental health problems.

At the news conference, Rachel Laser, deputy director of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, said there has been "enough pain, enough despair, enough injustice. Let us learn from our grief and the errors of the past, and resolve in this very moment to do better."

Laser said that religious leaders throughout the country will mobilize their congregants to join in an Interfaith Call to Prevent Gun Violence on Feb. 4. On that day, Americans will call their Congress member and ask that they be "held accountable for the safety of our communities."

Alliance members also sent a two-page letter to Congress that urged the lawmakers to lead the way toward a safer society that not only protects children in schools against a mass shooter – a reference to the massacre at a Newtown, Conn., elementary school – but also stops individual inner-city gun murders as well.

Forty-seven religious leaders from numerous faiths signed on to the letter. The signers included the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, the Jewish Reconstructionist Movement, the Rabbinical Assembly, the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and Women of Reform Judaism.

Book publisher to be distributed south of the border

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When sales of 1,000 units are considered pretty good and 5,000 puts you into the bestseller category, it may be time to go looking for a bigger sandbox to play in.

At least that's the strategy of upstart Mantua Books, a mini, if not micro, publishing company based in Ontario that's looking to the sunnier climes south of the border to help put it permanently in the black.

Mantua is a small operation but one that feeds on big ideas: it focuses on politically incorrect authors that mainstream publishers seem to ignore. The brainchild of real estate developer Howard Rotberg, Mantua has carved out a niche for itself by offering works by conservative commentators whose books are beyond the pale for larger publishers. These are authors who unabashedly favour Israel and defend traditional western civilization, with its freedoms and rights, he said.

Rotberg, whose day job involves developing affordable and "infill" housing and renovating heritage buildings, has poured his soul and plenty of his own money into Mantua Books. It's more than a business, and he's more than a publisher. In fact, he describes himself as "a soldier" in a war for traditional western values and for Israel against an alliance of leftists and Islamists. Mantua is the vehicle by which he fights the good fight to place before the public authors who stand up for these traditional causes, he said.

"I see it as a war of ideas and censorship by a mainstream media and publishing houses and academia. My role is to found and run and grow a publishing house that is friendly to authors dealing with Israel and the fundamental freedoms in the West that need to be heard."

The deck may be stacked against him – the mainstream press rarely reviews Mantua's offerings, he said – but he's finding an audience for his stable of authors. In a few months, Mantua will begin selling its books in the United States thanks to an arrangement with a U.S.-based distributor.

That will give him access to a vast new market – sales to American libraries alone will make a difference to his bottom line. "Canada is only a small part of the international market. Success hinges on getting American and international distribution," he said.

In the past year, he's penned agreements with a U.S. and an international distributor. One of Mantua's books, Romance and Revolutions, has already been distributed in England.

Rotberg launched Mantua in 2003, but the company was pretty much dormant until 2007. Since then, it has published, among others, High Noon for America: The Coming Showdown by Jamie Glazov, Those That Bless You, I Will Bless – Christian Zionism in Historical Perspective by Paul Merkely, and Delectable Lie – A Liberal Repudiation of Multiculturalism by Salim Mansur.

Howard Rotberg

As Mantua became more widely known, quality authors came on board, but developing a distribution channel proved the most difficult obstacle to success, Rotberg said.

Technology is also playing a part in making Mantua's books available to the public. In fact, "the publishing industry is undergoing a huge transformation. For smaller distributors, it's a good change," Rotberg said.

The traditional model of selling through bookstores is being challenged by ebooks, the digital, downloadable form of the medium, he continued.

Books that sold for $20 or $30 in paper versions can be sold for $9.99 digitally. That removes the very costly process of printing and shipping, which cut into publishers' profit margins, he said.

Ebooks are also more appealing to young people, who are used to viewing written material online.

Gone are the days when young people decorated their apartments with shelves containing hundreds of books, he said, adding that digital books take up less space, are portable and less costly.

About 20 per cent of Mantua's sales are ebooks, and that's expected to climb to 50 per cent in five years. Currently, the vast majority of sales, 60 per cent, are paper books sold through Amazon. Another 10 per cent are sold through Mantua's website, and the remaining 10 per cent are sold in bookstores.

But by going digital and circumventing the need for print editions, is Mantua sowing the seeds for its own demise? Rotberg believes there's still an important role for traditional publishers, even in the digital age.

"We promote the book, help authors set up lectures, book tours, retain publicists. We help authors with the editing process," he said.

At Mantua, which Rotberg operates with a couple of volunteer assistants, he does all the editing himself. Mantua hires PR and marketing consultants in whatever markets the company is trying to reach.

As a small, self-financed publisher, Rotberg has brought the company "from zero" to "a break-even proposition."

"We are growing with every year. Our books are selling in the four figures in Canada, which is very good for Canada," he said.

"The reason we've become profitable now is that as a mature publisher with the good titles we have, distributors are interested in working with us. That drives costs down so we can make money."

Tel Aviv to offer free city wide WiFi

Compiled by CJN Staff

Residents and tourists in Tel Aviv will receive free WiFi connection beginning in March as part of a new project initiated by the Tel Aviv-Jaffa Municipality.

Voted as one of the "Three Most Innovative Cities in the World" by the Wall Street Journal, Tel Aviv-Jaffa will provide free WiFi access at 80 major locations around the city, including the city's Mediterranean promenade, the Hatikvah Market, Florentin Street, Park Hayarkon and Old Jaffa, as well as major city streets, parks and at tourism sites. Effectively, the entire city will be covered by next fall.

"We are thrilled about this new project that will further propel Tel Aviv-Jaffa's identity as one of the world's most tech-savvy and innovative cities," said Ami Allon, consul for tourism, Israel Government Tourist Office – Canada.

"We hope this new initiative will help simplify travel around Tel Aviv-Jaffa and provide additional excitement for travellers arriving in Israel this year."

Users can access the free WiFi service on computers, tablets and smartphones with bandwidths of at least 20 MB.

Author discusses use of pot in Jewish tradition

Chavie Lieber
JTA

After graduating from a modern Orthodox high school in New York, author Yoseph Needelman, now 30, moved to Jerusalem to explore the use of marijuana in Jewish tradition. For eight years he bounced around religious institutions, interviewing spiritual leaders to find out if there was indeed a place for drugs in the Jewish world.

The result of his research is compiled in Cannabis Chassidis (Autonomedia), a book that explores the Jewish use of marijuana.

With the U.S. states of Colorado and Washington having recently voted to legalize marijuana for recreational use, popular views of the drug are rapidly evolving. Needelman's book may find an audience among those seeking religious and practical advice on the use of marijuana.

JTA caught up with Needelman while he was on a book tour in America.

Tell me a little bit about yourself and how you came to write this book?

I grew up in Brooklyn, N.Y., and went to modern Orthodox day schools. I went to Israel after high school to find things in Judaism that I felt must have been part of ancient traditions of how to live well, notably cannabis. I was introduced to drinking in a religious context, but relating to marijuana [religiously] was a big question for me. If the Torah is a religious framework that guides us in enjoying everything that is good, it must relate to other things I connected with, like pot or yoga.

I wrote this book because I think kids need advice and counsel on doing drugs that they are going to do anyways. If they are smoking pot and taking other drugs, they need to know how to do it effectively. My book discusses how to do those things in a helpful, effective and responsible way. That might include noticing the point where you don't need a particular drug anymore.

Why do you think religious institutions have a negative outlook on drugs like marijuana?

Judaism is defined by its certain rejections. It is designed to protect us from foreign ecstasies and bad habits. I think here in America, certain western values became the law, and they reject smoking and using herbs for a bunch of reasons. Judaism, which emerged from the ashes of Jerusalem's survivors, the people who were able to make themselves seem most unthreatening to the state, demands that its successful leaders not threaten anyone, especially not the state, so it's become taboo. Marijuana is not identified as being especially Jewish, even though a lot of big rebbes traditionally were associated with it.

Where is it written that Chasidim use drugs, and who are some of the famous ones?

The Vilna Gaon [an 18th-century rabbi and opponent of Chasidism] wrote in his cheirim, or writ of excommunication, that Chasidim are untrustworthy because they dance, sing and smoke. Some famous rabbis that sound like they used drugs were Rabbi Yisroel Ben Eliezer, or the Ba'al Shem Tov, the father of the chassidic movement. A Baal Shem/Doktor is someone who picked wild grasses and barks and made medicines out of them, which he would sell, along with advice on how to use [them] properly. He used to smoke from a water pipe to experience an aliyat neshamah or ascension of the soul.

His biographer, Rabbi Yakov Yosef of Polonoye, said that he would give his entire portion in this world, and in the world to come, just for a taste of what the Ba'al Shem Tov got from his pipe.

Rabbi Israel Friedman of Ruzhyn used to smoke a pipe, too, and fill up the entire room before Shabbat. He would open a window and say, "These are the clouds of the week leaving, and the clouds of Shabbos are coming in." Rabbi Levi Yitzchok of Berditchev used to smoke a pipe before he prayed.

Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, who came much later, was actually opposed to drugs, but he would smoke occasionally [in order to gain trust from] people who were already on a high level of spiritual awareness and curiosity. Carlebach, however, was always frustrated by the sense of dependence the group had on it.

Was marijuana ever used for Jewish practices?

In Exodus 30:23, it talks about the anointing oils and there's an ingredient called knei bosem. [The 11th-century commentator] Rashi says it is "important," and the Ramban explains in greater detail that the ingredient is "universally valued, in every country, and every empire." Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan, a later redactor, gives over other opinions, one which is this ingredient is marijuana, because it was globally popular, especially in traditions of lands like Yemen and Morocco.

In your book, do you talk about using drugs for a spiritual experience?

No, I don't like when people say that. The drugs don't create a spiritual experience. Maybe the intentions of why you are using can be spiritual. But pot alienates you from your responsibilities and needs. It's not like alcohol that makes you feel warm. But then again, marijuana is the least dangerous drug – the worst thing it can do is make you lose track of your priorities.

What are the benefits of marijuana?

The main advice I suggest are a few things. The best framework for smoking pot is when you are on your own and you have an activity to focus on. It's also good to be in a small group of people that you really love. It's also really important to make sure that smoking pot won't become a problem for you, and that it won't keep you from noticing what's really important.

The good effects are that it [can give] a sense of peace of what's going on around you. It can help you break down daunting issues that might be on your mind and help you process things more easily. Weed is also great for praying, especially if you're not in a hurry. And of course, the best way to use it, spiritually, is to share it with someone.

SPOTLIGHT ON COMPOSER DAVID NOWAKOWSKY & WORKS RESCUED FROM HOLOCAUST

David Nowakowsky (1848-1921) and his music were almost wiped off the face of the earth, and even his tombstone was destroyed. Thousands of his manuscripts were smuggled out of Russia to his granddaughter Sofie in Germany after the Bolsheviks seized Odessa's Brody Synagogue in 1922. In 1937, Sofie hid the music on a farm in occupied France before fleeing with her family to Switzerland.

Cantor Ronald Graner gives a talk on "Music of a Forgotten Master – Searching for David Nowakowsky," focusing on the music, how it survived, the people involved in its rescue and their family trees. Presented by the Jewish Genealogical Society of Toronto. Temple Sinai, 210 Wilson Ave. Wednesday, Jan. 30, 8 p.m. www.jgstoronto.ca

Jewish Playwriting Festival: The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company presents the return of In the Beginning: A Jewish Playwriting Festival. The festival is designed as an opportunity for emerging theatrical voices that offer fresh perspectives on Jewish history, heritage and experience. Sponsored by the RBC Foundation, it offers Canadian playwrights the chance to workshop scripts with professional actors and directors culminating in a staged public reading.

Submissions are invited and should include the script, a synopsis of the play and the playwright's resume. Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, Attn: Avery Saltzman, 121 Parkway Forest Dr., Suite 107, Toronto M2J 5H4. The festival takes place at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, Studio Theatre, from June 17 to 20, 2013.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS
HELLO I MUST BE GOING
Just as Ruth and Stan Minsky are about to finish remodelling their empty nest, their daughter Amy lands on their doorstep. Recently dumped by her hotshot lawyer husband and with no career prospects, she is wallowing in self-pity. Amy's life is suddenly turned upside down when she falls for the handsome son of her father's potential business partner. Jeremy (played by Christopher Abbott from HBO's Girls) is perfect in every way, except one: he is only 19. As Amy, Melanie Lynskey (Two and a Half Men) delivers a pitch-perfect performance of an adult with a lot of growing up do. Blythe Danner, as the mother, is at her icy best.

Soundstreams celebrates 30th anniversary

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

If there's a way to bridge the cultural and religious gaps in the Middle East and achieve peace between Jews, Muslims and Christians, it might be found through music.

At least that's the belief at Soundstreams, a Toronto-based non-profit centre dedicated to discovering and presenting new Canadian musical compositions and artists. It's celebrating its 30th anniversary with a concert dedicated to Jerusalem.

Titled The Three Faces of Jerusalem, the Jan. 27 performance at Koerner Hall will feature an eclectic mix of world music representing the three Abrahamic faiths of the region.

Scheduled to represent Judaism are internationally renowned Sephardi vocalist, Paris-based Françoise Atlan, and Israeli oud master Yair Dalal.

They'll be joined on stage by Palestinian-Canadian singer Roula Said, Montreal-based Persian sitar player Kiya Tabassian, viola de gamba player Pierre-Yves Martel, percussionist Ben Grossman and conductor David Fallis, among others.

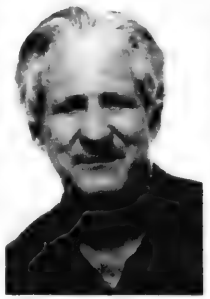
Canadian composer James Rolfe will also premiere his Five and a Half Bridges, a musical ode to the quest for peace in the Middle East.

Lawrence Cherney, artistic director and founder of Soundstreams, said the anniversary concert has been in the works for two years and is about fostering peace through music.

"When we originally developed this concert, we had no idea of the significance it would have, given the current political climate in the Middle East," Cherney said. "Each of the artists who have agreed to participate has illustrated an ongoing commitment to use music and collaboration as a way of bringing people together."

Speaking to The CJN from New York last week, Cherney said he hoped the show's audience would come away with a renewed sense of hope for the Middle East.

"The presentation will explore Jerusalem's roots and the heritages of all three religions," he said. "Despite periods of strife in the region... there have been times when all three [religions] have got along, and in a way, they're all joined at the hip. There were periods, especially in medieval times, where if you heard two songs written in Jerusalem, aside from one in Arabic and the other in Hebrew, one wouldn't know what culture you were hearing.



Lawrence Cherney

"The program never had a political agenda. But it has the belief that art and music can bring people together and bridge the gaps between cultures."

Reached in Paris last week, Atlan told The CJN she was looking forward to working with the other musicians at the event.

Of particular interest to her is the opportunity to work with Dalal, whom she said she has been in contact with ever since the two met in Israel last year and promised each other they would eventually collaborate on a project.

"This will be a nice meeting between artists. All artists on this project present a bridge for one another. We are all artists with specific identities and we will put these all together," Atlan said.

She is also eager to return to Toronto to perform for the community. She will be singing in Hebrew, Ladino and Arabic, though, as of last week, the specific songs for the gig remained up in the air, she said.

The artists are scheduled to gather in Toronto starting Jan. 23 to choose and rehearse their set lists in the run-up to the show.

Romantic comedy feels at times like tragedy

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Hello I Must Be Going should strike a disheartening chord of recognition among some viewers.

What if your beloved daughter goes through a painful divorce and lands on your doorstep?

That's the theme of Todd Louiso's feature film, scheduled to be screened by Chai Tea & A Movie on Sunday, Jan. 27, at 5 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Cinemas. Ostensibly a romantic comedy, it unfolds at times like a tragedy.

Amy (Melanie Lynskey) has been dumped by her philandering husband and returns to the suburban home of her upper middle-class Jewish parents, Stan and Ruth Minsky (John Rubinstein and Blythe Danner). She arrives in an aimless frame of mind as they continue to remodel their ranch-style house.

Given to fainting spells and crying fits, Amy has become a recluse, not having left their house in three months. "You just had some bad luck," says her father, trying to calm her frayed nerves.

Amy's fortunes seem to take a turn for the better after she meets Jeremy (Christopher Abbott) at a dinner party hosted by her parents. Jeremy, 19 and about a decade younger than Amy, is an aspiring actor who has serious doubts about acting.

He's also the son of an entrepreneur who's thinking of forming a partnership with Amy's father, a lawyer who badly needs the business so he can settle into retirement comfortably.

Melanie Lynskey and Christopher Abbott in Hello Must Be Going.

As the film gains traction, Jeremy seduces Amy, who seems to have nothing better to do than to roll in the hay with him. Louiso handles these scenes competently enough, creating a dual world of lustful encounters and budding business deals.

He is also adept at drawing a portrait of a young divorcee struggling to get back on her feet and deciding whether her romantic fling with Jeremy is worth the trouble.

Lynskey is convincing as Amy, while Abbott delivers a fairly credible performance as a young man who falls hard for an older women.

Danner, looking alternately haggard and glamorous in a supporting role, is the personification of a bored and frustrated housewife whose destiny lies entirely in her husband's hands. Rubinstein, cast as a minor player, has little to do and is eminently forgettable.

Hello I Must Be Going has something to say about failed relationships and new beginnings, but it feels like yesterday's loaf of bread and is thus somewhat stale.

Alouettes' coach Trestman takes helm of NFL's Bears

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

Marc Trestman's Jan. 16 announcement that he was leaving to become head coach of the Chicago Bears after five years helming the Montreal Alouettes didn't exactly take sports pundits by surprise.

They all knew that Trestman, whose contract with the Als expired after last season, was itching to get back to the National Football League (NFL) as a first-time head coach, even if he was always too characteristically circumspect to say so publicly.

They also seemed to agree that Trestman's departure would leave a void that could prove challenging to fill, even if the team stayed competitive with stalwarts such as veteran quarterback Anthony Calvillo, pro football's all-time leading passer.

"The Als should remain competitive without Trestman," commented sportswriter Herb Zurkowsky of the Gazette.

Trestman, 57, a native Minnesotan, was the second Jewish coach to oversee the Als, after Marv Levy in the 1970s. (Hall-of-famer Levy also went on to be a head coach in the NFL, with Kansas City and Buffalo.) Trestman becomes the NFL's only Jewish head coach in his new role with the Bears.

He boasted an enviable record with the Als after coming on board in 2007.

It included a total win-loss regular season record of 59 wins and 31 losses, four East Division championships (2008, 2009, 2010 and 2012), and three Grey Cup appearances, with victories in 2009 and 2010 and a loss in 2008. In 2010, Trestman was named CFL coach of the year.

The Grey Cup win in 2009 over the Saskatchewan Roughriders was especially memorable, when the Alouettes came back from 16 points down with 11 minutes to play and then prevailed by one point with a field goal and no time left on the clock.

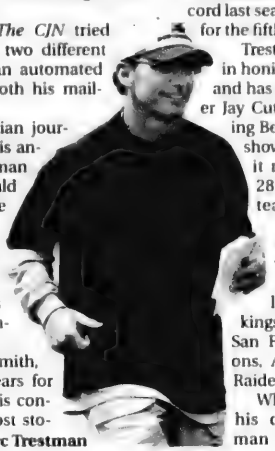
At the time, Trestman was his usual low-key self, telling The CJN that a "little bit of luck" helped his team come through in the clutch.

Last week when The CJN tried to reach Trestman at two different cellphone numbers, an automated voice reported that both his mailboxes were full.

Speaking to Canadian journalists one day after his announcement, Trestman said his new job would not have been possible without the Als.

"I'm filled with an incredible amount of humility today," he told reporters. "This [new position] is an incredible opportunity."

He succeeds Lovie Smith, who was with the Bears for nine years. The team is considered one of the most storied franchises in the NFL. It had a 10-6 record last season, but missed the playoffs for the fifth time in the last six seasons.



Marc Trestman

Trestman is considered an expert in honing the skills of quarterbacks and has said he's eager to help starter Jay Cutler and the underperforming Bears offence improve over its showing this past season, when it ranked 16th in points and 28th in total yards out of 32 teams.

Trestman previously served as assistant coach with a number of NFL teams, including the Cleveland Browns, Minnesota Vikings, Tampa Bay Buccaneers, San Francisco 49ers, Detroit Lions, Arizona Cardinals, Oakland Raiders, and Miami Dolphins.

When not occupied with his duties as a coach, Trestman resides in North Carolina.

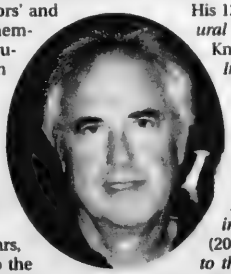
PGA Canada to present Rubenstein with highest award

Compiled by CJN Staff

The PGA of Canada will recognize golf writer Lorne Rubenstein with its George Cumming Distinguished Service Award on Jan. 25 at Canada Night during the PGA Merchandise Show in Orlando, Fla.

"On behalf of the PGA of Canada's national board of directors' and the association's 3,800 members, I'd like to congratulate Lorne Rubenstein on being named the 2012 recipient of our most prestigious award, the George Cumming Distinguished Service Award," said PGA of Canada president Gregg Schubert.



Lorne Rubenstein

"For more than 35 years, Lorne has contributed to the game of golf through his passions as historian, journalist and author."

Born in Toronto in 1948, Rubenstein was curator for the Royal Canadian Golf Association's museum and Canadian Golf Hall of Fame from 1976 to 1982 before become the first editor of SCORE-Golf magazine from 1981 to 1983.

He has also written a golf column for the Globe and Mail since 1980. He has won four first-place awards from the Golf Writers Association of America, one National Magazine Award in Canada, and, most recently, he won the award for the best feature in 2009 from the Golf Journalists Association of Canada.

His 12 books include The Natural Golf Swing, with George Knudson (1988); Links: An Insider's Tour Through the World of Golf (1990); The Swing, with Nick Price (1997); The Fundamentals of Hogan, with David Leadbetter (2000); A Season in Dornoch: Golf and Life in the Scottish Highlands (2001); Mike Weir: The Road to the Masters (2003); A Disorderly Compendium of Golf, with Jeff Neuman (2006); This Round's On Me (2009); and the latest Moe & Me: Encounters with Moe Norman, Golf's Mysterious Genius (2012).

Rubenstein is also a member of the Ontario Golf Hall of Fame and the Canadian Golf Hall of Fame, and was honoured with the Canadian Sports Media Lifetime Achievement Award in 2009.

'They took a genuine interest in the lives of everyone they came across'

She told them, "Please remember what I taught you about love and kindness, respect for others, and your responsibility to the Jewish community. Remember to acknowledge daily the gifts and blessings God has given you."

Wise's daughter, Dina Shapiro, recalled her mother as an "incredible, loving, formidable, charitable woman" who was devoted to her family and her work.

As well, she said, her mother began to write books with Shapiro's daughter once she learned to read. Shapiro also read a recent children's book that Wise and Pichosky collaborated on.

"They brought so much joy to each other... and to all who spent time with them," she said.

Pichosky's daughter, Sari Rosenblum, recalled a loving father who made lunch for her every day when she worked around the corner from him at her first job.

A widower when he met Wise, Pichosky had known his first wife, Sandra, from the time he was 12 years old. They were married 46 years. Religion became "an essential part" of Pichosky's life after he kept a promise to God to become observant if he survived brain surgery in his late 20s, Rosenblum said.

A concerned neighbour found the couple Jan. 10 after they didn't show up for lunch the previous day and failed to answer repeated phone calls.

In Toronto, Bialik issued a statement Jan. 11 saying that the "entire Bialik family is distraught by the tragic loss of Rochelle Wise and her beloved husband, Donny Pichosky. Rochelle was an adored member of the community and respected as an outstanding educator and woman of great character and kind spirit."

In Florida, Wise volunteered at a Hebrew day school in Hallandale, helping children with learning problems. She also was an active member of Na'amat, the Jewish women's organization.

Bobby Freeman, a co-director of Crestwood, wrote in an online condolence message that he came to know Wise as "a unique woman, with strength of character, foresight, and the ability to lead with love."

A statement from the camp said that Wise "was a selfless individual who took a genuine interest in the lives of everyone she came across. As the director of Crestwood Valley Day Camp from 1990 until her retirement in 2005, Rochelle dedicated herself to the personal growth and development of every child and staff member in her care, and to creating summer memories that would last a lifetime. With limitless energy, unwavering courage and a passion for children, she was an inspiration to a generation of kids, an example to day camp directors across Toronto, and an amazing friend to those of us at Crestwood Valley."

A bereavement notice sent to Shaarei Shomayim members said that Wise and Pichosky "were important longtime members of our community along with their children and grandchildren. They were both selfless individuals who took a genuine interest in the lives of everyone they came across."

Cantors have been forced to reinvent themselves

Rosen, who was invested as a cantor by the School of Sacred Music of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in 2003, noted that the council is pluralistic and includes members from Reform, Conservative and Orthodox congregations.

"Our Orthodox colleagues will not sing at a concert with a woman cantor (because of prohibitions against hearing a woman sing), but will sit around the table with her," he said.

"We try to be sensitive to both," he added, explaining that the council strives to alternate men-only events with mixed ones.

Speaking generally, he said that cantors have been forced to reinvent themselves. The council tries to offer professional development to cantors in the field, to help hone and improve their skills, he said.

In addition to an expanded role for cantors outside of prayer services, things have changed in their role at services. Prayers have become "much more participatory," Rosen said. "That's shifted greatly over the last 20 years."

Israeli musician to conduct COC

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Daniel Cohen may be young, but he's already performing with the best.

Although he'll just be turning 29 next month, the self-described proud Tel Avivian has been travelling around the world, conducting orchestras in Europe, Israel, and now, Canada.

The morning of our interview was Cohen's first free morning in 28 days, he said. He had just spent time in Tel Aviv conducting Wozzeck, by Alban Berg, which he said may be the most complex stage work ever written and his favourite piece, as well as being the first opera he ever heard.

He left for Italy afterward to conduct Beethoven symphonies with the Teatro Petruzzelli orchestra in Bari. That's when he got the invitation to conduct Mozart's La clemenza di Tito for the Canadian Opera Company (COC) next month. He had only 11 days at home in Tel Aviv to study the score before being whisked off to Toronto.

"[It] was really a marathon for me," Cohen said. "I had 11 days without sleep, just to get through this score and study it deeply enough to rehearse it with this phenomenal cast of singers."

Although Cohen has never been to Canada, the COC invited him to conduct after receiving a recommendation from French composer/conductor Pierre Boulez and Israeli Daniel Barenboim, whom the COC's general director, Alexander Neef, called conductors of great renown.

Cohen is "very relaxed and free and at ease with what he is doing, and very comfortable even when faced with a challenging repertoire," Neef said, adding that Cohen has extensive experience conducting opera. "In a conductor, you need someone who knows how to work with opera singers and prepare an opera for performance."

Cohen said there's a big difference between conducting operas and conducting symphonies. In a typical symphony, the conductor arrives at rehearsal with his or her own interpretation of the music, which would be influenced by the character and sound of the orchestra. Conducting an opera can be much more complex.

"It's not a purely theatrical piece, and not a purely musical piece," he said, describing it as a multi-layered creation that combines each singer, conductor and director's interpretation of the music. "It's more of a collective effort in which all these amazing musicians contribute to making this overall production."

Cohen said he doesn't come from a musical family. His parents sent him to take piano lessons when he was six, but like many children, he wasn't thrilled with the instrument. Instead, he fell in love with the violin.

Daniel Cohen, who has conducted operas around the world. [James Cannon photo]

"My mother claimed I didn't like how the sound of the piano kept dying, and that I wanted to have a sound that I could sustain," he said, admitting he thinks it's a bit farfetched that he would have made that claim at such a young age.

He said he knew he wanted to conduct from the time he took up the violin.

'From the outside, it's a very glamorous life, but... it's a terribly difficult life'

"I like having that large palette of the orchestral sounds, where you have the violin and the oboe and the percussion instruments and the strings," he said. "It's a beautiful canvas to paint on."

He began conducting in London, England, where he studied at the Royal Academy of Music. He described his family as anglophiles – two of his grandparents served in the British army.

"Britain was in my blood," he said. "I had this impression that London was like living inside a T.S. Elliot poem, and I loved that idea."

At the academy, he put together an orchestra called Eden Sinfonia. Being in charge of an independent orchestra meant he worked in every role, including creating the programs, carrying the chairs to the stage, printing the music and more.

"I don't think I slept at all in those four years, but I learned so much," he said. "You can't really be a chef at a restaurant until you spend a few years washing the dishes."

Ultimately, that experience has helped him in his current work.

"You're stepping in on a tiny little stage for one person, and you're standing in front of 80 to 100 people who, most of them are old enough to be your parents, and you're asking them to work extremely hard to make your musical vision sound the way you want it," he said. "That's a lot to ask of a professional musician."

Although the age difference might seem stressful for Cohen, he said he doesn't usually feel it.

"The moment that anything goes wrong, then it matters that I'm young, but as long as I'm doing a good job, it never does," he said, though he joked that he might simply be denying the amount of pressure in order to cope.

Once the opera in Toronto wraps up on Feb. 22, Cohen will head back to the island of Jersey, off the coast of France, where he is chief conductor of the Jersey Chamber Orchestra.

Later this year, he'll take part in the Lucerne Festival, where he will share a concert with French composer Pierre Boulez, who supervised the composition of a piece written specifically for Cohen, which he will perform there.

"It's a great honour for me," Cohen said. "It's like for a young artist to open for the Beatles."

He said he's looking forward to learning from Boulez, whom he described as one of the few great examples of someone who is both a conductor and a composer.

Although Cohen said he doesn't feel as if he has accomplished enough to give advice to beginners, there's one piece of advice he remembers from his early days.

"From the outside, it's a very glamorous life," he said. "But to any of us who are lucky enough to work, they would all say the same thing: it's a terribly difficult life."

Specifically, the biggest challenge is that he's rarely in any one place for long, and it's almost impossible to have a personal life or a family.

"As good as you're going to get, and as successful as you're going to get, and as rich as you're going to get, you're not going to get anything that's recompense for living that life except music," he said, remembering this advice from one of his former teachers. "If you're doing it for any other reason, stop now."

La clemenza di Tito runs at the Canadian Opera Company for nine performances starting on Feb. 3. For more information about Cohen, visit danielcohenconductor.com.

The fingerprints of family life

Married With Kids

Lauren Kramer

As a mom, there are a ton of daily little annoyances to contend with: Kids who don't wipe their bums or flush the toilet. Clean clothes that land in the laundry hamper because little hands are too lazy to fold them up and put them back in the closet. Gobs of toothpaste in the basin, and homework, backpacks and sweaters discarded throughout the house.

But over the past few weeks, as the voice in my head started its litany of complaints at having to incessantly pick up and clean up, my thoughts turned to Newtown, Conn. I started thinking about those poor parents who no longer hear the echo of little feet running through their homes, and whose children's backpacks sit dormant in the corner, never to be carelessly flung over a shoulder again.

I thought about the trauma of having to wake up each day with the knowledge that there will be one less bowl of Cheerios on the kitchen table, one less mop of hair to lovingly comb and one less warm embrace, that tight, comforting hug that says, without words, "I love and need you." How on earth do you live with that?

We measure time by the tragedies that life flings our way. I learned that when my mother passed away nine years ago. Asked to pinpoint when something occurred, I'd involuntarily calculate first the painful weeks, and then the months and years since I'd last seen her alive. She was 57, and though taken well before her time, we'd both known she'd die first. It's just nature's way.

Growing up, I knew a kid who desperately wanted a motorbike, a request his father adamantly refused. "If I die," he told his son, "you'll grieve, but you'll get over it. But if you die before me, I'll grieve, and I'll never, ever get over it."

Such is the torment of the bereaved parent – a lifetime sentence of sorrow, heartache and longing for a dead child. All they did was go to school, those young, innocent Newtown kids. And there, in a place of trust, learning and nourishment, they were mowed down by a force of pure evil, their lives obliterated in an instant.

How do you see any beauty in the world after a loss so incomprehensible? Is it even possible to ever feel truly happy again, after death has not just knocked on your door, but stolen your child, the light from your very eyes?

I ache for those parents' loss as I pick up the debris of toys and clothes from the floor, stack homework assignments and sort laundry for the umpteenth time.

As much as housework is drudgery, ever since Newtown, I've been cherishing the fingerprints of a happy childhood embedded in my daily chores. Those grass-stained jeans, muddy shoes and dog-eared pages of homework are testament to the exuberance, hope and happiness that defines my children's lives. Lives I'm privileged and awed to be a part of.

LASAGNA SOUP

- 1 tbsp olive oil
- 1 pkg imitation ground meat
- 1 onion, diced
- 2 cloves garlic, minced
- 1/2 tsp red pepper flakes
- 1/2 tsp fennel seeds, crushed
- 4 c vegetable broth
- 28 oz can diced tomatoes
- 2 tbsp tomato paste
- 1 tsp oregano
- 1 bay leaf
- salt and pepper, to taste
- 1/2 lb whole wheat pasta
- 4 oz ricotta
- ½ c parmesan cheese, grated
- ½ c mozzarella cheese, grated
- handful basil, chopped

Heat oil in a large saucepan over medium heat. Add imitation meat; cook until lightly browned, breaking into crumbles as you go. Remove from pan and set aside. Add onion to pan; saute until tender, about 5 mins. Add garlic, red pepper flakes, fennel; saute until fragrant, about 1 min. Add broth, tomatoes, tomato paste, oregano, bay leaf, "meat" crumbles, salt and pepper. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat - simmer 30 mins. Add pasta and cook until al dente, about 7 min. In a small bowl, mix together ricotta, parmesan and mozzarella cheeses. Serve soup topped with the cheese mixture and basil. Serves 4, adapted from Closet Cooking

Idle No More

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Idle No More, the current native protest movement, has a powerful momentum.

It's supported by native Canadians and non-natives alike, and it's moving ahead with an intensity that can only reflect many Canadians' dissatisfaction with government policy in general. The fact that Idle No More is able to attract so many non-natives is a success in and of itself.

Idle No More is a movement with a mission to empower native Canadians to push the federal government to deal with them honestly on issues such as treaties, housing and health.

It's also a crusade to clarify the true native narrative, one that is clear and audible to everyone from sea to shining sea. If done well, Idle No More can help us realize we have sinned against native Canadians in many ways, particularly through the creation of residential schools, the last of which closed in 1996. Hopefully, we will learn, or re-learn, that before then native children were often taken from their mothers' arms and transported 1,000 miles away to schools run by the church and the state.

Idle No More will give us a glimpse into the inner workings of native leadership as they strategize among themselves and with the feds. We will undoubtedly witness the elegance of the elders and native governance, which is rooted in age-old teachings and wisdom.

I'm hoping Idle No More will put an end to stereotypes such as the the "lazy native." Those whom we call lazy are more than likely mournful and without hope for the future. Why wouldn't they be? Their world was systematically dismantled, and when they asked for their things back, they were denied.

I'm hoping citizens across the country, whether in Newfoundland or British Columbia, will recognize through this movement that they harbour such stereotypes and that they go through a process of intense introspection to see the damage they might have caused, sincerely apologize, and work with our aboriginal people toward a better Canada.

Idle No More has encouraged me to think about stereotypes. I've noticed they slip into our individual and national psyche when we're not looking. I am amazed at some of the unfounded statements I've heard about native Canadians from educated people. Somewhere, someplace, from someone, they heard that natives are naturally violent, conniving and sly. This helped me understand how our enemies were able to amp up their propaganda machine and convince millions of people that Jews are lazy, liars, penny pinchers and even baby killers.

Idle No More may or may not maintain its current momentum. It's hard to say. But what is clear is that social media, which is here to stay, has played a role in uniting natives and non-natives across Canada in a most important way and will continue to do so. That groundswell, that spring thaw, was so dynamic that Prime Minister Stephen Harper had to meet with native leaders and commit to personally overseeing the native portfolio.

Familiarize yourself with Canada's aboriginal people and their plight. Google "native Canadians" to get going. It's all there. Find out if your synagogue has a social-action committee and if the native issue is on its agenda. Encourage your rabbi and leadership to speak about Idle No More and what we can do, the Jewish community, to help our native brothers and sisters, many of whom are suffering within our own boundaries.

Israeli voters surprise experts

David Horovitz
The Times of Israel

Analysis

Trust the Israeli electorate to produce a surprising and acutely complicated electoral result, at the end of an exemplary, empowering exercise in democracy. Here are some initial conclusions.

1. Israel did not move to the right

Remarkably, given the regional instability and consequent Israeli wariness, the right-wing bloc took a bit of a pasting. It's a more hawkish right-wing bloc, but it's a smaller one, somewhat less able to get its own way. Instead, Israel moved a little to the centre, as exemplified by the remarkable debut of Yair Lapid's Yesh Atid party. What does this mean for the big regional issues, and especially for interaction with the Palestinians? Well, that depends on the nature of the coalition. And for that, we may have to wait a while.

2. Netanyahu is battered, but he's still a winner – almost certainly, with some serious caveats

You go into national politics because you want to lead your nation. And once you've made it to prime minister, you go into your next elections in order to remain prime minister. That's what Netanyahu has apparently managed. This despite Netanyahu not being particularly popular and being a very well-known quantity in an election where many voters plainly favoured the fresh, inexperienced and unsullied candidates. The vote was one for change. Dozens upon dozens of sitting Knesset members were swept aside. But Netanyahu rolled with the wave, and here he is again.

Shuls Get SIP Funds

OTTAWA — The federal government's ongoing Communities at Risk: Security Infrastructure Program (SIP) last week announced this year's funding recipients, which included two shuls. In Toronto, Beth Tikvah Synagogue received $32,769, while Hamilton's Adas Israel Congregation got $32,096. The $1-million fund is disbursed annually to communities at risk of hate crimes to help implement security measures. It's administered by Public Safety Canada. Since its inception in 2008, it's given some 80 Jewish groups more than $1.8 million.

Shoah Recalled

TORONTO — Markham, Ont., Mayor Frank Scarpitti marked International Holocaust Remembrance Day at a Jan. 29 council meeting, which also featured a showing of the new short film based the memoir of local resident and Holocaust survivor Felix Opatowski, 88. After the film, Opatowski presented his memoir, Gatehouse to Hell, to the mayor. He was joined by a representative of the Azrieli Foundation, which published his book and produced the short film. Markham joined 16 other Canadian municipalities in marking International Holocaust Remembrance Day, including Toronto, Ottawa, Halifax and Vancouver.

WORLD

Post Chides Obama

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Barack Obama should "reset" his ties with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the Washington Post urged. "The wise U.S. policy would be to concede, and maybe even welcome, Mr. Netanyahu's re-election while quietly urging him to construct a centrist government," said an editorial on Jan. 22, the day of Israel's election. The Post chided Obama's "poor handling of Israel, which he has not visited and where he is widely regarded as supportive of the nation's defence but unsympathetic to its psyche."

School Approved

LOS ANGELES — A dual-language Hebrew and English charter school was approved for Los Angeles. The Lashon Academy is the first Hebrew-language charter school approved by the Los Angeles Unified School District, which has some 230 charter schools, including other dual-language immersion schools.

Jewish-Arab American Sues Over Search

DETROIT — A Jewish-Arab American woman is suing a U.S. airline and the federal Transportation Security Administration for removing her from a plane and strip-searching her.

Shoshana Hebshi, whose mother is Jewish and father is Saudi Arabian, is suing Frontier Airlines and law enforcement for ethnically targeting her.

Shoshana Hebshi

A SWAT team forcibly removed Hebshi, 36, an American citizen who lives in Ohio, and two Indian men in handcuffs from Frontier flight 623 after it landed on Sept. 11, 2011, in Detroit. She was held for hours, questioned and strip searched.

A fellow passenger had accused the three of acting suspiciously. Hebshi did not know the Indian men, who reportedly were sitting in her row.

Also named in the Jan. 22 lawsuit are the Wayne County Airport Authority, Detroit Metro Airport Police, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and Customs and Border Patrol.

Hebshi said she was "frightened and humiliated" and believes she was singled out due to her ethnicity.

"Racial profiling is unconstitutional and counterproductive. No one is safer because an innocent mother of two was dragged off a flight, strip searched and held for several hours," Sarah Mehta, an attorney with the ACLU of Michigan, said in a Jan. 22 statement issued.

The TSA would not comment on pending litigation.

Fire destroys landmark bagel bakery

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

It will be "a while" before the Ontario fire marshall determines the cause of the three-alarm fire that destroyed Haymishe Bagel Shop on Bathurst Street near Lawrence Avenue on Sunday morning, said a captain with Toronto Fire Services.

Capt. Mike Strapko, who works in public information services, said in a telephone interview that firefighters will not have any information until the water is cleared from the basement of the bakery and any information found is sent to the forensics lab.

"This normally takes a long time," he told The CJN.

He said that four people were in the bakery when they noticed fire in the basement at around 10 a.m. Seventeen fire trucks and 65 firefighters responded to the 911 call.

Division Cmdr. Bob O'Hallam told CP24 that the first crews arrived and found heavy flames in the basement.

"They tried to enter to attack the fire there, but the floor was already collapsing and they were forced out."

The fire eventually spread to the apartment above.

Strapko said that the only person injured in the fire – six people were assessed by Toronto Medical Services – was a firefighter who hurt his ankle, but he remained on the job.

It took until around 2 p.m. for the fire to be contained.

Neighbouring businesses were evacuated, said Strapko, but none had more than light smoke damage.

In November 2006, a four-alarm fire destroyed Perl's Meat & Delicatessen on the same block.

Unnoticed, under the radar

From the editor's desk...

In the fog and smoke of the constantly churning Middle East, a change in the tone and substance of Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas' public remarks since the Palestinians were granted non-state member status by the UN General Assembly, has been little noticed in world media.

On Jan. 4 in Ramallah, on the occasion of the anniversary of the founding of the El-Fatah militia of the PLO, Abbas delivered a fiery speech that could have been written for PLO founder Ahmad Shukeiry or his benighted successor Yasser Arafat.

Ignoring every paragraph of every page of every bilateral agreement the PA has signed with Israel since 1993, Abbas exhorted his people to embrace a future burning with the stinging vapours of exploding bombs and discharging rifles.

So shockingly sharp was Abbas' swerve from previous speeches, Prof. Dore Gold, Israel's former ambassador to the United Nations, noted that it "may have marked a turning point in the relations between the Palestinian Authority president and the State of Israel."

Islamic affairs expert Jonathan Halevi, writing for the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, characterized Abbas' Jan. 4 message as "a radical political doctrine."

What struck Gold and Halevi as gravely surprising, if not a bit unnerving too, was Abbas' frequent resort to themes of violence and non-accommodation.

"Abbas chose to re-emphasize that the Palestinian people remain on the path of struggle to realize 'the dream of return' of the Palestinian refugees and their millions of descendants," Halevi wrote.

It was especially noteworthy for Halevi that Abbas invoked the names of some of vilest slaughterers of Jews in Palestinian history as fit and worthy role models for the youth of his nation.

"Abbas pledged to continue the path of struggle of previous Palestinian leaders, mentioning the Mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini, who forged a strategic alliance with Nazi Germany, and heads of Palestinian terror organizations who were directly responsible for the murder of thousands of Israeli civilians. All are equal and suitable partners in the Palestinian struggle, and their ideological platform – even if it is terrorist and/or radical-Islamist – is a source of inspiration for the Palestinian people," Halevi wrote.

Of course, the commonly heard rejoinder to Halevi's observation is that "one person's terrorist is another person's hero." But stretching the notion of hero to include Adolf Hitler and his confederates attests rather revealingly and disgustingly to the character of the individual suggesting that stretch. There is absolutely no room, not the tiniest, milli-measurement of light, for any moral relativism on the suggestion of Hitler/Mufti as hero.

Gold speculated that vast geo-political and geo-cultural changes in the region since 1993 account for the sudden shift in Abbas' demeanour.

"With the uprisings in the Arab world since 2011," Gold wrote, "a new rejectionist front has come to power through Islamist parties that are now ruling from Tunisia to Egypt."

Accommodation with the Jewish state is plainly at odds with the core dogma of the Islamists whose rising tide of rejectionism and confrontation seems to be washing across much of the Arab world.

It may be that Abbas does not want to stand on the wrong side of Arab history, as he perceives it. He may be reorienting PA policy. Or, alternatively, he may simply be doing what he does with an expert's finesse: saying one thing to the West and quite the opposite to Ramallah. Was it a coincidence that Abbas delivered his Jan. 4 message during the Israeli election? Perhaps he wished to push the Israeli electorate further to the right to enable him to continue proclaiming his people's victimhood to Israeli intransigence?

Mahmoud Abbas

But, much as they confounded the many vaunted Mideast pundits, the Israeli voters confounded him too.

The majority of Israelis clearly voted to try to find a mutually respectful, secure way in which to find an agreement with the Palestinians. They may be forgiven, however, for not yet reposing all of their trust in Mahmoud Abbas, who urges his people to regard Hitler's henchmen and accomplices as great figures of history.

The most compelling observation about Abbas' recent behaviour belongs to Halevi. He concluded, rather sadly, "Anyone who expected that Abbas would follow a more moderate course after the UN General Assembly resolution of Nov. 29, 2012, upgrading the status of the PLO's observer mission to that of an observer state, was undoubtedly disappointed with Abbas' remarks. He was not preparing the Palestinian people for making peace, but rather reverting to rhetoric perpetuating and even escalating the conflict." –MBD

ANSHEL WISE'S CIGAR STORE AND 'STEAMSHIP OFFICE'

The Ontario Jewish Archives holds ledgers from steamship agents based in Toronto who booked the travel of immigrants escaping the pogroms in Europe. Revealed in these documents are the names of the men and women who left their lives in Europe behind to sail to Canada, seeking opportunities for themselves and for succeeding generations. One of the ledgers is from Anshel Wise's cigar store and "steamship office" on Dundas Street West in Toronto. Wise, an immigrant himself, helped bring hundreds of Jews from Europe on the shipping lines. From left are the Wise children: Syd, Lil and David, in 1922. Hallandale Beach Police are still not releasing details about the Jan. 9 murder of Toronto snowbirds Donny Pichosky and Rochelle Wise, but they met with residents of the couple's condo complex Jan. 22 to reassure them there is no increased risk to them.

As well, Hallandale detectives were scheduled to meet with Toronto police and the couple's families here this past Sunday and Monday to learn more about the victims' lives, according to the South Florida Sun-Sentinel.

Hallandale Beach police chief Dwayne Flournoy told the Sun-Sentinel that police believe providing details to the media would "severely hamper" their ability to solve the case.

In an online video accompanying the article, Flournoy expressed confidence that police would solve the case.

"I'm very encouraged with the evidence we've collected, the analysis of the evidence, and some of the theories that we have developed," he told the paper.

Donny Pichosky and Rochelle Wise

Hallandale Beach mayor Joy Cooper called the crime "highly unusual" for the city, according to the paper.

Pichosky, 71, and Wise, 66, were found Jan. 10 by a concerned neighbour who had a key to their Venetian Park townhouse after they failed to show up for a planned lunch and didn't answer repeated phone calls.

Wise was a preschool administrator at Bialik Hebrew Day School and a founding director of Crestwood Valley Day Camp.

Pichosky, her husband of four years, was a retired businessman who volunteered with seniors at Baycrest, and had spent at least 20 years wintering in Florida.

Alleged subway scammer facing nearly 70 charges

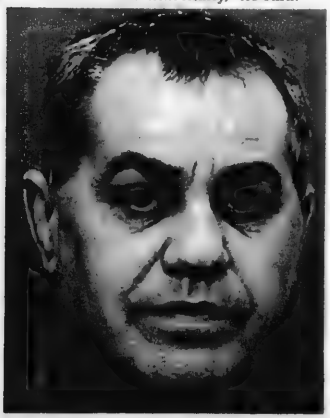
Alleged subway fraudster Israel Aharanovitz remains in custody as police receive increasing numbers of calls from victims.

As of last week, some 60 to 70 people had come forward with complaints of being scammed, said Det. James Turnbull of the Toronto Police Service.

"I've never had that many," he said.



Israel Aharanovitz

One of the calls came from a woman who recalled a run-in with Aharanovitz in New York City in 1987 or 1989.

"She remembered he scammed her before," Turnbull said.

Given the volume of calls he's received, he still hasn't been able to return them all, he added.

So far, Aharnovitz, 63, faces nearly 70 charges of fraud under $5,000.

Police allege he targeted mostly women in the Jewish community while in subway stations.

"He purported to be a visitor from Israel then asked for a loan to help him out of a financial dilemma," police allege. "The victims would turn over a quantity of money to the man."

The sums ranged from $40 to $1,000.

Aharanovitz, a native of Israel, was arrested Jan. 9 at the Glencairn subway station after police saw him approach several women. Initially, he was charged with four counts of fraud under $5,000.

Police believed there were more victims, and appeals to the public resulted in the large number of people responding with information about the suspect, Turnbull said.

Anyone with information is asked to contact police at 416-808-1300, or to call Crimestoppers at 416-222-TIPS (8477). They can also go online at www.222tips.com, text TOR and leave a message to CRIMES (274637).

Yair Lapid proves the Israeli centre is thriving

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The surprising emergence of Yair Lapid's centrist Yesh Atid party with 19 seats in the Jan. 22 Israeli elections has caused a number of western journalists to re-evaluate their belief that Israel had been shifting to the right.

Polls throughout the campaign undermined this view, despite some rightward movement within already conservative political factions.

Indeed, the "rightward" drift isn't true of Israeli society as a whole, the "rational centre" (as some Israeli analysts have termed it) of which has been steadily represented for many years by about two-thirds of the populace. This is the two-thirds that supports a two-state solution with the Palestinians, but believes, in equal numbers, that such a deal is not possible with the current Palestinian leadership and with Hamas ruling Gaza. That's why, in this election, only 18 per cent of Israeli voters placed negotiations with the Palestinians as their top priority for the government.

Yair Lapid

What filled that spot for almost half of voters were socio-economic issues: jobs, wages, affordable housing, shared citizen responsibilities, etc. These are the same issues that brought out half a million people to protest in the streets of Tel Aviv and other cities in the summer of 2011. These are the voters who felt their concerns were not adequately addressed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. It's Lapid who has taken up their cause and pledged not to abandon it if he joins a new government.

Western journalists are now playing catch-up to the long-standing and newsworthy realities of Israeli society, which have been largely overlooked by the familiar coverage of political elites and conflict-driven stories involving the Palestinians. Just a couple of years ago, veteran Jerusalem-based NBC News correspondent Martin Fletcher remarked that Israel is the most covered but least understood country in the world. Fletcher admitted that he himself had contributed to this lack of understanding by failing, along with his colleagues, to adequately report about Israeli society.

In the immediate aftermath of the election and with Lapid in the international spotlight, a couple of Israeli analysts tackled some common myths about both Israelis and their politics. In a Jan. 23 interview with CTV News, prominent Israeli writer Yossi Klein Halevi, describing Lapid as the big winner of the election, noted: "We tend to think of Israeli society as divided between left and right, but there is a very large centre that is hawkish on security but dovish on territory. Lapid managed to project this centrist sensibility."

In a piece written that same day for Tablet magazine, Klein Halevi explained what constitutes the Israeli centre (and he didn't exempt the Israeli media, either, from failing to correctly portray it): "The Israeli media is speaking relentlessly of an even divide between the left-wing and right-wing blocs. That's nonsense. Yesh Atid isn't a left-wing party; half of its voters define themselves as right of centre. Instead, the rise of Yesh Atid affirms the vigour of the centre. Despite the historic failure of every centrist party – Kadima, the last attempt, virtually disintegrated in this election – centrist Israelis continue to seek a political framework."

The centre thus includes the centre-right along with the centre-left. By this definition, many who support Likud certainly belong to the centre. It may come as a surprise to learn, for instance, that according to last December's Israel Democracy Institute/Tel Aviv University Peace Index, 52 per cent of Likud voters support the two-state vision.

Iran still on the agenda

Eclipsing the reports last weekend of the attempts in Israel by the freshly elected members of the 19th Knesset to cobble together a new governing coalition was a fast-moving series of reports concerning Iran.

Mohammad Reza Heydari, a former Iranian diplomat who defected in Norway in 2010, gave an interview to Israeli media last Friday in which he unambiguously stated that the theocratic regime in Tehran would have no reservations about using a nuclear weapon against the Jewish state.

"If Iran gets to the point where it has an atomic bomb, it will certainly use it, against Israel or any other [enemy] country," Heydari told his interviewer on Channel 2.

Two days later, on International Holocaust Remembrance Day, at the 26th International Islamic Unity Conference in Tehran, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad called, once again, for Israel's demise.

As reported by The Times of Israel, Ahmadinejad told the assembly: "Under [the] circumstances [in which] the corrupt, uncultured and murderous Zionists are occupying and killing oppressed people, we should not sit idly by." His meaning was clear to everyone in the large hall.

But even as the Iranian president was speaking to the august assembly on Sunday, he was undoubtedly distracted by reports seeping into western media – despite his best efforts to prevent the seepage – that the prized nuclear facility in Fordo had been set ablaze, apparently by a large explosion.

Iranian officials denied that there had been an explosion or fire at the plant. But the report that found its way into the light was too detailed to be quickly brushed aside. It appeared on the website wnd.com and alleged that the blast destroyed much of the installation and had trapped more than 200 people underground. It further claimed that the blast "shook facilities within a radius of three miles," that Iranian security forces had "enforced a no-traffic radius of 15 miles," that the Tehran-Qom highway was shut down for several hours after the blast, and that, "as of [last] Wednesday afternoon [Jan. 23], rescue workers had failed to reach the trapped personnel."

There were also unconfirmed reports that the United States and Israel knew about the explosion and indeed may have somehow been involved in bringing it about.

The truth will eventually be known. If indeed there was a fire at the Fordo facility and if sabotage played a role, the Iranian regime too, in addition to the facility, will have been rocked.

Tehran can harbor no doubts about the resolve of the countries it continually threatens to deprive it of the means to carry out its threats. Iran's obsession with obtaining a nuclear weapon will be very high on the policy agenda of the new Israeli government, as it was for the last one.

It should also be high on the agenda of every western government.

Palestinians must make concessions for peace

Israel Lyon, chair of JSpace Canada's co-ordinating committee, claims that Israeli settlements in the West Bank "do impede peace" ("West Bank construction," letters, Jan. 17). That is garbage. Peace talks didn't happen when there were no settlements, but they did when Israel was building them. Fatah's refusal to negotiate because of settlement construction is just a way for the Palestinians to put the blame on Israel for lack of progress toward a peace agreement. When these talks were happening, the Palestinians made no concessions and turned down several offers of a state. The real reason there is neither talk nor agreement is that there are two Palestinian groups, fighting with each other and undemocratic, and neither will settle for anything but control of all of Mandate Palestine.

Fatah refuses to drop the demand that their so-called refugees, all semi-prisoners of Arab governments and kept on welfare by the United Nation s for the last 65 years, be returned to Israel. Hamas, in its written constitution calls for the complete destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews. Yet, Israel is supposed to make peace.

Until the world – the United States, the European Union and Russia – stops thinking that pressuring Israel for concessions, which have never worked, is the key to peace and puts that pressure where it belongs, on the two Palestinian groups, there is no hope of a negotiated peace agreement. What is happening is farcical and would be hilarious if it weren't so stupid and potentially tragic.

Israel agreed to return captured lands

Sam Mitnick is correct that United Nations Security Council Resolution 242 calls for "every state in the area to live in peace within secure and recognized borders free from threats and acts of violence" ("Rockets threaten peace talks," letters, Jan. 17). However, according to resolutions subsequent to the 1967 Six Day War, while Israel successfully captured the West Bank territories, Israel then agreed to return areas of the captured lands (Abba Eban, 1968) that, from an international perspective, are designated occupied lands. In return, Israel gets defensible borders and recognition as a sovereign state. Israel, unlike any other nation in the region, requires security guarantees. The Arab Peace Initiative of 2002 substantiates this recognition of Israel. But what has Israel done since 1967? It has built settlements with 300,000 settlers, permitted vandalization of Palestinian properties, uprooted olive trees, etc., and endured a horrendous Palestinian terrorist campaign in return for their grievances with us. The Israeli government must stop what's construed by many, including the majority of Israelis, as destructive activities mitigating the possibility of a two-state resolution to the Mideast conflict.

Martyred WWII cantors

Ishei Yisrael Ut'fillatam is a list of European cantors who were martyred during the Shoah. The phrase "Ishei Yisrael Ut'fillatam," borrowed from the Amidah, means "the fiery offerings and prayers of Israel." This liturgical wording originally described the intensity of religious fervour required for true prayer, as if to say: may our words have the same meaning and effect as fiery sacrifices once did for our ancestors. Initiators of the project borrowed it to indicate that in the death camps and elsewhere, those who bore the responsibility of leading their congregations in pleading before the Almighty themselves became the sacrificial offerings of their era.

The list, currently totalling 1,447 names, dates and places (where available), was started by Cantor Joseph Levine and Cantor Solomon Mendelson, They found the majority of names in the databanks of Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. Others came from searches of Yiddish and Hebrew volumes such as the many Yizkor books of decimated communities whose survivors had published them in Israel beginning in the late 1950s. The compilers are now turning to individuals who might remember a relative who served as a cantor in Europe before World War II. Anyone with such information is requested to email the Cantors Assembly at caoffice@aol.com.

Why I voted for Yair Lapid

When Yair Lapid's father, the well-known journalist and politician Tommy Lapid, was on his death-bed, he told his son: "I'm leaving you the state of Israel."

Tommy, a Holocaust survivor, meant this metaphorically: the generation of survivors was entrusting the gift of a Jewish state to its children. But with the rise of Yair Lapid, head of the Yesh Atid (There Is a Future), which emerged from nowhere to become Israel's second-largest party in last week's election, Yair's "inheritence" could become literal. More than any other politician aside from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu himself, Yair may now determine the next phase of Israeli politics.

"Yair," not "Lapid": we call our politicians Bibi and Shelly and Tzipi with a misleading intimacy, when in fact we can't bear most of them. But even Israelis who wrongly dismiss him as a lightweight – a former TV talk show host and heartthrob, with no government or combat experience – tend to like Yair.

That's because he is frankly, unapologetically, in love with the State of Israel. There is nothing complicated about Yair's Israeliness. He is not a hyphenated Israeli, whose loyalty to the state depends on its fulfilment of an ideological agenda. Yair conveys the impression of a man comfortable in all parts of Israel. He is a secular Israeli who has shown increasing interest in Judaism. He supports a two-state solution and opposes settlement construction outside the large settlement blocs. Yet, he launched his campaign from the West Bank city of Ariel, sending the message that settlers are part of Israel too.

He opposes the wholesale draft exemption of ultra-Orthodox young men, but he advocates a gradualist approach and has an ultra-Orthodox rabbi on his Knesset list. He emerged as the voice of middle class disaffection, yet included on his list two Ethiopians, representatives of one of the country's poorest constituencies. (Other parties tend to include a token Ethiopian.)

Some see Yair's Israeli eclecticism as an expression of ideological immaturity, of indecisiveness. In fact, it reflects his ability – alone among today's leaders – to define the Israeli centre.

To understand Yair's Israeliness one needs to understand his father, who emerged as a teenager from the Budapest ghetto committed to a single act of faith: the Jews need a home. Tommy's Zionism was simple. It was about gratitude to Israel for helping heal him from the extremities of exile. Tommy's Israel didn't need to be territorially whole or a light to the nations. It simply needed to be.

Yair's biography of his father, Memoirs After My Death – one of the best books to emerge from the "second generation" – is written in Tommy's voice, as if from the beyond. (Tommy was a famous atheist, and Yair ends the book with these words: "And then I stopped breathing... After that, there is nothing. I told you so.") That is more than a clever device: it is an expression of the near-total identification of a son with his father, and with his father's history. So deeply has Yair internalized his father's story that he can write Tommy's "autobiography" in a voice that Israelis will recognize as unmistakably that of Tommy Lapid.

And yet, as Yair has insisted since entering politics, he is not his father. "I've learned from my father," he's repeatedly said, "but also from his mistakes."

Tommy's biggest political mistake was his divisiveness: his party, Shinui (Change), was aggressively secular, not only attacking ultra-Orthodox separatism

but also mocking ultra-Orthodox beliefs and lifestyle.

By contrast, Yair has sought dialogue. Last year, in an address at the ultra-Orthodox campus of the Kiryat Ono College, Yair conceded that the ultra-Orthodox had won. Secularists, he said, thought we could create a state that would marginalize you, while in reality we can't make any major political decision without your input. But, he added pointedly, secularists also won: we've created a modern state with a thriving Hebrew culture. And so, he concluded, both camps have to choose between continuing their culture war or jointly taking responsibility for the state they share.

More than any other party, Yesh Atid defines the country's emerging cultural centre. The son of Tommy Lapid has included no fewer than two rabbis on his list. But that list also includes Ruth Calderon, a leader of the growing movement of secularists seeking a new Jewish identity outside of Orthodoxy. The message is radical diversity within a shared Israeliness.

Yair's ideological challenge will be to clarify the political centre and give coherence to the instincts of a majority of Israelis. That centrist majority seeks a politics that isn't afraid to acknowledge the complexity of Israel's dilemmas. These voters agree with the left about the dangers of occupation and with the right about the dangers of a delusional peace. Centrists want a two-state solution and are prepared to make almost any territorial compromise for peace. But they also believe that no concessions, at least for now, will win Israel legitimacy and real peace. Centrists want to be doves but are forced by reality to be hawks.

I voted for Yair because, as a centrist Israeli, I have no other political home.

Netanyahu, who accepted a two-state solution in principle and then imposed a 10-month settlement freeze, tried to turn Likud into a centre-right party, more pragmatic than ideological and able to attract voters like me. But the ideological right within the Likud revolted. Today's Likud appears more hospitable to the far rightist Moshe Feiglin than to centrists like Dan Meridor, denied a safe seat in the Likud primaries.

The Israeli media are speaking relentlessly of an even divide between the left-wing and right-wing blocs. That's nonsense. Yesh Atid isn't a left-wing party; half of its voters define themselves as right of centre. Instead, the rise of Yesh Atid affirms the vigour of the centre. Despite the historic failure of every centrist party – Kadima, the last attempt, virtually disintegrated in this election – centrist Israelis continue to seek a political framework.

Will Yesh Atid be different from its failed centrist predecessors? How will the inexperienced Yair Lapid withstand the brutalities of Israeli politics?

I think Yair will continue to surprise us. What has taken him this far is his straightforward thinking, precisely what Israeli politics so desperately needs. (And his political adviser happens to be his father's closest friend, Ehud Olmert, the ultimate politician.) If Yair remains true to his ideologically simple but emotionally profound Zionism, he could help lead us to an Israel less at war with itself.

Finding inspiration on a desert hike

Because of deadline constraints, I'm finishing this article on Jan. 21, the day before Knesset elections here in Israel. You'll be reading this after the results are in and coalition discussions are well underway.

The Talmud teaches us that "prophecy is given to fools," but I tend to agree with countless polls' predictions that the two major Knesset blocs will remain intact, with a clear majority for right-wing parties of different hues. As Times of Israel editor David Horowitz's noted, the main difference will be that "the right has become the far-right."

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

This is not a result I would choose, and it doesn't augur well for Israel. Nor does the dearth of inspiring leaders from the centre-left segment of our political spectrum.

But things aren't all bleak.

During this lacklustre election season, I have also found pleasure. My daughter, Naomi, just turned 18 and will be voting for the first time, and I've been observing her decision-making processes. She's been reading party platforms, participating in Facebook discussions on the issues, and standing up for her own worldview, even if it wasn't always popular.

And thankfully, not everything in this country revolves around politics. My family is preparing for my son Natan's bar mitzvah. As part of that process, and prodded by a friend, Elie, whose son Emanuel will also be bar mitzvahed soon, Natan and I recently joined them for two days of hiking in the south on sections of the Israel National Trail, an almost 1,000-kilometre-long path that meanders from the Lebanese border to the Red Sea.

The day we began, Elie and I had planned to meet at a campsite southeast of Mitzpe Ramon, to sleep there and begin hiking early the next morning. That plan evaporated when a meeting I was attending went well beyond schedule, and Natan and I left Jerusalem at 7 p.m. instead of at 2.

Elie, who has undertaken to trek the entire 1,000-km trail before Emanuel's bar mitzvah, has already hiked many sections. He told me to make my way to Ein Yahav, an agricultural settlement bordering Jordan in the northern Arava, and upon my arrival, he directed me to the home of "trail angels," wonderful people all along the trail who open their homes to hikers, providing them with free shelter, showers and food.

Arriving at our angels' home, Natan and Emanuel disappeared to play basketball and ping pong with our hosts' kids, while Elie and I got to know their amazing parents: he a red pepper and cherry-tomato farmer, she a special-education teacher, happily bringing up four kids in this remote part of the country.

And as often happens in Israel, it turns out we have common acquaintances. Once a week, they drive 50 minutes toward Eilat to study with a remarkable young Reform rabbi I also know who lives in the Arava and provides locals with his own brand of religious services.

After a great night's sleep in our hosts' living room, at 6 a.m. the next morning, we set off to the starting point of our 40-km, two-day hike. It wasn't easy. Up steep mountainsides and down even steeper cliffs, we trekked for almost 10 hours each day in near-desert conditions – perfect for this time of year. The views were spectacular and the experience exhilarating.

Besides one large group of scouts going the opposite direction, during those two days, we hiked alone, only occasionally passing and being passed by an Orthodox family of seven hailing from a small community in the Golan Heights. Our two parties camped together overnight at a remote campsite with no creature comforts and absolutely no access to the world beyond – including no cellphones or Internet service.

Clambering out of my tent at dawn, the sight was otherworldly. With a ray of sunshine poking over the mountaintop, I watched as one of our travelling companions said her morning prayers facing a mountain several hundred times her own height. It was enough to make just about anyone a believer.

At the end of those two days, my feet ached and I felt I could go no further, but I soon realized how reinvigorated I really felt.

Similarly, when I worry about my kids' future here in Israel, I realize what a wonderful place this is and how much more wonderful it could be. Despite the obstacles, people will find the resolve to continue striving to make it even better.

Obama, Israel and R.E.S.P.E.C.T.

As Israelis reached the end of another intense election campaign, covering a wide range of complex issues, the president of the United States suddenly intervened by attacking Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's policies and declaring that "Israel doesn't know what its best interests are." Even given the history of friction between President Barack Obama and Netanyahu, this interjection was surprisingly harsh and violated the basic norms of behaviour in relations between democracies.

The citizens of most countries, including the often prickly Americans, generally don't like to be told that they are incapable of choosing leaders and governing themselves, and that outsiders know better. And Israelis are particularly sensitive to the intervention of powerful foreign governments, for whatever reason, including well-intentioned (and paternalistic) motives.

For 2,000 years, the Jewish People did not have the opportunity to govern themselves and were subject to the whims, and often, the hatreds, of the leaders of powerful empires. Indeed, the fundamental objective of Zionism was, and remains, the restoration of Jewish self-determination in a sovereign state in our historic homeland. Like any other nation, we must determine our own fate, for better or for worse, and while mistakes are inevitable, at least they're our mistakes. That's the essence of freedom and democracy.

Powerful outsiders – including foreign political leaders, journalists, Jewish philanthropists and organizations from the Diaspora – are free to give advice and provide assistance, but when it comes to critical decisions, they are, and must, remain the responsibility of the citizens of Israel and our elected leaders. When distant advice turns into manipulation or the imposition of policies, it becomes an infringement on sovereignty and independence.

In addition, in this case, as in many others, Israelis are far more familiar with the complexities and options than distant observers, including the leaders of powerful countries. How simple it must seem to Obama and his advisers, sitting in Washington, to look at Israel, which he failed to visit once during his first four-year term, and repeat the popular mantra that settlements are the main obstacle to peace. If this were indeed the situation, Israelis would be the first to embrace the hope of an end to 65 years of hatred, warfare and mass terror.

But most Israelis live in a different and more complex reality, and they're still recovering from the false optimism of the 1993 Oslo peace accords, which ended in a mass Palestinian terror campaign.

That experience was reinforced by the 2005 Gaza withdrawal, when settlements weren't frozen, they were dismantled. And in response, Gaza became the launching pad for thousands of rockets aimed at Israeli cities. Nevertheless, during Obama's first term, Netanyahu agreed to an unpopular settlement construction freeze, and once again, the Palestinians took no measures toward peace.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Yes, it's easy to find a few Israelis who agree with Obama and other foreigners who think that they know Israel's "true interests" better than the elected government, but this group had every opportunity to present its opinions to the voters, and they have been repeatedly rejected.

This is not due to some conspiracy of "right-wing settler fanatics" – the anti-settler movement in Israel is very prominent in the media, and receives massive financial assistance from European governments and ideological groups such as the New Israel Fund. As the vast majority of Israelis showed again on Jan. 22, they simply remain unconvinced by these claims.

Even more than erring on the substance, or trying to manipulate public opinion and impose his views of "Israel's best interests," Obama erred by failing to show respect. If he and his advisers knew anything about Israeli democracy and the spark at the core of Zionism, they would understand that respect for national sovereignty – for being a state with equal rights to determine our destiny and interests – is essential and not subject to compromise. Given his own personal background, respect is a value that Obama should readily understand.

Election may signify shift in priorities

The Jewish voter turnout in last week's general election in Israel rose to 70 per cent, while the Arab turnout was higher than expected, surprising Israeli pundits on both counts.

A disquieting narrative had emerged that many Israeli Jews were bored by the campaign and might even stay at home on election day. But they showed up in greater numbers than anticipated, thereby reinvigorating Israeli democracy.

In the Arab sector, observers feared that more than half of Muslim and Christian Arabs, representing about 20 per cent of Israel's population, would boycott the election, underscoring their disaffection and alienation from the Jewish state. But after the dust had settled, the Central Elections Committee announced that 56 per cent of Israeli Arabs had participated in the Jan. 22 election, compared to 53 per cent in the last one.

All in all, 67.8 per cent of Israelis exercised their democratic right to vote, the highest proportion since the 1999 election, when Ehud Barak, a former army general running as a Labor party candidate, defeated the Likud incumbent, Benjamin Netanyahu.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In this election, Israelis rebuked the status quo, but did not reject it altogether. Voters essentially sent a message calling for fresh new faces and a shift in priorities from the external to the internal.

They most definitely did not usher in a historic political earthquake of the kind that forced prime minister Golda Meir to step aside following the election in the wake of the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Given Israel's unresolved conflict with the Palestinians, Iran's drive to develop a nuclear arsenal and the tumult that has rocked the Arab world since the 2011 Arab Spring rebellions, foreign affairs figured quite heavily in the rhetoric of candidates, as was the case in previous elections.

But with the echoes of the 2011 social protest movement still resounding in their ears, many lower and middle-class Jewish and Arab voters tended to focus on bread-and-butter socio-economic grievances rather than on external issues.

For the typical Israeli voter in 2013, the rising cost of living and the unaffordable price of housing, for example, were more important in their calculations than Iran's nuclear ambitions or Israel's stalled peace negotiations with the Palestinians.

Reflecting on the results of the election, Prime Minister Netanyahu declared that the Israeli public had conveyed to him a clear, unambiguous message of the need for "great internal changes."

As he prepared to launch coalition negotiations, a process that may take as long as two months, Netanyahu suggested he would place the emphasis on domestic rather than security matters.

Citing three core issues he will focus on as he tries to cobble together a government, he said he would deal with the cost of housing, the question of national service in the armed forces on a more equitable basis, and the reform of the system of government.

After all the votes were finally counted, Israel was revealed yet again as a deeply divided country, fractured along political, social, religious and ethnic lines.

The right-wing secular and religious bloc, spearheaded by the joint Likud and Yisrael Beiteinu list, won 61 seats, while centre-left and Arab parties amassed 59 seats.

If nothing else, fickle voters humbled high-flying politicians, showing them they cannot take anything for granted.

They gave Netanyahu, potentially a three-term prime minister, a weakened mandate to continue governing should he succeed in forming another coalition government. But in a devastating body blow to his prestige, they whittled down his Likud party's parliamentary representation.

By all accounts, some of his supporters defected to Naftali Bennett's Jewish Home party, a more right-wing version of the Likud that advocates the annexation of 60 per cent of the West Bank, where Jewish settlements are located.

Voters sent Avigdor Lieberman, the former foreign minister, a harsh message, too, cutting his Yisrael Beiteinu party down to size.

It would appear that some of his backers, mainly Russian immigrants, abandoned him after his indictment on charges of corruption. In all probability, some of them shifted toward the centre, voting for Yair Lapid, the pragmatic leader of the new, upstart Yesh Atid (There is a Future) party.

Lapid was the big winner in this year's election, winning a stunning 19 seats, with Yesh Atid becoming the second biggest party in the Knesset and replacing Yisrael Beiteinu as a kingmaker.

By no coincidence, Lapid was the first opposition politician Netanyahu phoned after the election to discuss future alignments. During the final stages of the campaign, Lapid said he would be willing to serve in a government led by Netanyahu. Lapid will probably join Netanyahu in what could be a right-wing-centrist government.

Although Lapid is currently riding high, and is that rare Israeli politician who exudes glamour, charisma and trust, he should be careful not to succumb to the temptations of complacency.

Yair Lapid

Middle-of-the-road parties in Israel, ranging from Yigael Yadin's Democratic Movement for Change to Tommy Lapid's Change party, have catapulted into the limelight, only to disappear beneath the waves without a trace.

Lapid, the late Tommy Lapid's son, was not the only centrist politician who fared reasonably well.

Shelly Yachimovich, the head of the reinvigorated Labor party, managed to bag 15 seats, not a bad outcome for a party that had sunk into obscurity and irrelevancy under the leadership of a series of lackluster leaders, including Ehud Barak, the current defence minister.

But in a crushing blow to his pride and standing, Shaul Mofaz, the Kadima party leader, was solidly rejected by voters. Kadima, having been established by then-prime minister Ariel Sharon in 2005, won 28 seats in the 2009 election, but this time around, it was reduced to a paltry rump of two seats.

Tzipi Livini, a former Kadima leader and foreign minister, as well as head of the new Hatnuah party, gained only six seats, leaving her in a fairly marginal position.

Right-wing zealot Bennett picked up 12 seats, not winning a sufficient number of mandates to qualify him as a potential power broker. But the presence of his party in the Knesset signifies Israel's rightward turn since the Six Day War.

The Jewish left, as exemplified by the Meretz party, won six seats, improving its position in the Knesset. But the left remains a spent force in Israel.

'Abandon romantic fantasies' of Israel: prof

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

North American Jews who want to maintain an adult relationship with Israel should be prepared to publicly criticize its imperfections, the University of Haifa's dean of students says.

"To maintain a serious relationship with an object of our love over time, we need to develop a more mature approach to Israeli society, which by no means is perfect," said Hanan Alexander, a professor of the philosophy of education who is scheduled to speak at Beth Tzedec Congregation on Feb. 5 at 7:30 p.m.

Alexander, who also heads the university's International School and its Center for Jewish Education, said Israel's supporters have a responsibility to speak out when abuses of power in Israel are exposed.

In an interview, he suggested Jews should be more critical of Israel.

"When we overly romanticize a subject of our affection, we have a tendency to relate to that subject uncritically. We don't want to hear about problems and faults."

But this is an unhealthy attitude, he warned. It creates "a very fragile relationship," resulting in "disappointment, hurt and abandonment."

Israel is neither better nor worse than any other place, noted Alexander, the author and editor of seven books on education. "Israel, like most democratic societies, strives to improve and make things better for its citizens."

At the same time, Jews must voice criticism openly as they debate Israel's imperfections, said Alexander, a graduate of Stanford University and the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

"Only when we abandon our romantic fantasies about Israel and confront it as it really is can we encourage improvement. We can also then recognize Israel's many accomplishments, while seeking to address its faults."

Claiming that Jews and non-Jews abroad relate to Israel naively, he said they should not fear that criticism might embolden or strengthen Israel's enemies.

Hanan Alexander

"Israel is a strong, highly self-critical society and can withstand criticism. Israel will even benefit from criticism."

One reason why North American Jews tend to look at Israel naively is because their institutions and schools relate to the Jewish state uncritically, not paying sufficient attention to "hard questions" about "sensitive topics" that some may find difficult to discuss, he said.

Those who claim that Jews should not air their "dirty laundry" in public are wrong, he said. "In the digital age, everyone's dirty laundry is all over the Internet. To refrain from discussing sensitive or problematic issues comes across more as denial than concern, and in the end does more harm than good."

He added, "Free expression is a key principle of an open, liberal, pluralistic democracy. As an open society, Israel benefits from those who express their concerns in public. And if someone delivers an unfair critique based on a false premise, which is all too often when it comes to Israel, the best way to address this issue is in the public square. The best response to bad speech is more speech, not suppression of speech."

The majority of North American Jews have not grown disillusioned with Israel, he argued.

"Most Jews in the mainstream middle appreciate the complex situations in which Israel often finds itself," he said. "But the best way to keep people engaged is to solicit and take an interest in their views. All Jews have a stake in Israel, so it is important to listen respectively to a variety of opinions from abroad as well as at home."

Alexander contends that the delegitimization of Israel in intellectual and academic circles is a serious problem, but the arguments levelled against Israel in these forums are often grounded in highly questionable assumptions.

"Israel is held up to standards not expected of others," he said. "Those who deny Jews their inalienable right to political self-determination and cultural self-expression in the name of human rights are denying a fundamental right to Jews. If Jews have no right to national self-determination, neither does anyone else."

Alexander claimed that anti-Israel critics who base their arguments on neo-Marxism, post-modernism and post-colonialism greatly simplify Israel, hewing to the notion that Israel has no right to exist if it does not conform to "some fanciful ideal."

Jews need to recognize the rights of the Palestinians, both in Israel and the West Bank, he said.

"To claim our rights reasonably, we need to acknowledge the rights of others. Reasonable people may differ concerning the effectiveness of this or that [Israeli] policy, but all are obliged to agree that, if the Palestinians have national rights, so do Jews."

Alexander said Jews must acquire "a more mature understanding" of Israel as a liberal democracy, which is as imperfect as any other in the world.

"As Winston Churchill once said, the imperfections of democratic societies probably make democracy the worst form of government – except for all the others."

Volunteers assemble 'survival kits' for homeless

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

With temperatures plummeting recently, the cold snap came as a bit of a shock to Torontonians.

But it was much worse for the homeless. For most of us, it's hard to imagine being homeless, never mind living on the street in the extreme cold. When temperatures drop to extreme-cold levels, homeless shelters are overflowing.

Project Winter Survival (PWS), a volunteer-run organization that provides essential supplies to people living on the street during the winter, has this year distributed 3,000 "survival kits" through 172 agencies in the Toronto area.

The group's 14th annual drive was launched Jan. 12. The first phase was a packing event at PWS headquarters, at the Bargains Group on Caledonia Road in Toronto. "In just over three hours, 200 volunteers packed 93,000 items into 3,000 survival kits for the homeless," PWS co-founder Jody Steinhauer said.

Health workers predict that the situation on the street for the homeless in 2013 will be bad. Anne Marie Batten, a street nurse, said, "We had a record number of homeless deaths in 2012, and many shelters are full and overflowing."

She added that the survival kits are essential for people living on the street, "as those individuals who have pets as a means of emotional support… cannot bring them into shelters… and couples who do not want to be separated [can't stay in shelters]. We also use the kits to establish relationships with homeless people that have trust issues, such as individuals with mental illnesses and substance abusers."

From clothing and food to personal-care items – and a sleeping bag – the survival kits often mean the difference between life and death for the homeless.

Volunteers pack survival kits – made up of clothing, food, personal-care items and a sleeping bag – for the homeless.

The second phase of the PWS annual drive was distribution day on Jan. 19, when the kits were loaded onto trucks by 150 volunteers. Picking up the kits were representatives from organizations such as Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Congregation Darchei Noam, the Red Cross, Covenant House, Scott Mission, Eva's Initiative and the Salvation Army.

Ve'ahavta's community outreach liaison, Ori Belmont, described the situation of one of Ve'ahavta's homeless clients. "The gentleman that I spoke with is a very warm and endearing middle-aged Jewish man. Not unlike many others in his situation, extremely articulate and bright. Many erroneously believe that those living on the street, or in a shelter like this man, are neither," Belmont said.

"I described to him the contents of a survival kit generously donated to us… He explained to me the socks, hat and water bottle would be particularly useful. This man's home was behind a well-known kolel. He had a makeshift structure, sleeping cardboard boxes and a blue tarpaulin. His tallit bag was hanging from a tree drying off, as was his black hat."

Belmont said the man told him, "My faith in humanity is strong, and despite my predicament, it will never change."

PWS was founded 14 years ago by Steinhauer, chief bargain officer of the Bargains Group, a discount wholesaler, together with her husband, Lorne Simon. Since then, PWS volunteers have assembled and distributed over 15,000 survival kits.

"When we started to hear about the challenges of the homeless, we decided as business leaders to make a necessary contribution to help meet the overwhelming demand by local agencies that struggle to help the homeless survive the frigid Toronto winters each year," Steinhauer said. "Sadly, requests for PWS kits continue to rise each year. We will never let this project end as long as there are homeless people on the street."

Any one of those people on the street could be us, if we had a bad turn of luck, Steinhauer said.

Shoah survivor on Wallenberg stamp

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

When Canada Post issued a stamp commemorating Raoul Wallenberg earlier this month, the Crown corporation had no idea one of the images on it was of Winnipegger Judith Weiszmann.

The stamp features Wallenberg's picture against a backdrop of the life-saving Schutz-Pass document he created to save Jews from Nazi persecution and deportation from Hungary.

It so happens that the pass Canada Post inadvertently used belongs to Weiszmann (neé Kopstein), who was saved by Wallenberg when she was 14. Her husband, Erwin Weiszmann, was also saved when Wallenberg issued a Schutz-Pass to him at Budapest's Josefvarosi train station in 1944.

Erwin passed away in 2011.

Wallenberg is credited with saving some 100,000 Hungarian Jews from the Nazis before disappearing under mysterious circumstances into Soviet custody. His fate afterward is still a mystery.

The Weiszmann's daughter, Ann, contacted The CJN last week to alert readers that the woman on the Schutz-Pass was her mom. She said Canada Post had purchased the image of the pass from a company that sells such things.

Judith and Erwin, who were married for 58 years, survived the war through Wallenberg's heroism. Afterward, the couple remained in Communist Hungary, where they were secretly married by a rabbi. Both also obtained civil engineering degrees.

They fled their home country in 1956 after the failed Hungarian Revolution, escaping to Austria.

But Judith and Erwin still felt uncomfortable living so close to the Soviet Union and decided to start a new life in North America, immigrating to Canada in 1957 and eventually setting up a successful engineering consulting firm in Winnipeg.

Speaking to The CJN, Judith said seeing her Schutz-Pass on a stamp was unexpected.

"I had no idea [Canada Post] was doing this. It came as a complete surprise," she said. "No one contacted me. And I don't think they could have made the connection that it was me, since it was my maiden name on the pass. But it is a great honour for me to be on this stamp."

As a 14-year-old in Budapest at the time, she said she knew full well the significance of having a Schutz-Pass, and she credited Wallenberg – she met him once, briefly – with "fierce bravery" in the face of the Nazi occupiers.

"To go around with a poker face and tell high-ranking German officers that they cannot take [people with Schutz-Passes] away... with his fearlessness he performed miracles," she said.

Wallenberg had employed her father as a co-ordinator in his embassy office after rescuing him from a forced labour camp, Weiszmann said, and the family received their Schutz-Passes from Wallenberg through her father.

Unmasked Judeophobia – The Threat to Civilization, a documentary that examines the rise of anti-Jewish ideology around the world, was screened by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) on Jan. 15. The film, which drew a packed audience, focuses on the proliferation of anti-Israel bias in academia and cultural institutions, misinformation campaigns and state-sanctioned denials of Israel's right to exist.

USY alum is now group's regional director

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

For Max Marmer, United Synagogue Youth – the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism – has been a "second family.

"It has given me so many lifelong friends, and so many different experiences," he said.

Max Marmer

Now, in his new role as regional youth director for the Eastern Canada Region of United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY), the 21-year-old York University administrative studies student wants to provide the same kind of experience he had to youngsters across eastern Canada.

Marmer's responsibilities include pre-teen and teen programming for students in grades 5 to 8 (Kadima) and grades 9 to 12 (USY). ECRUSY (online at ecrusy.org) holds at least four regional conventions and Shabbatons each year and also sends teens to USY's international convention every December.

Local programs such as snow tubing and movie nights usually include a social action or Israel awareness aspect, Andy Pascoe, chair of USCJ's eastern Canada youth commission, told The CJN.

ECRUSY extends east to Halifax, but active chapters are concentrated in Ontario at USCJ-affiliated synagogues – three in Toronto, and one each in Hamilton, Kingston, London and Ottawa. Teens can join USY as individual members if their synagogue doesn't have an active chapter.

Marmer's predecessor, Rabbi Irit Printz, was director until last August. Having worked as interim director until formally starting as director Jan. 16, Marmer said his short-term goal is to ensure that the rest of the programming year runs smoothly.

A broader goal is "helping our teens find their own personal connection to Judaism."

The next regional convention runs Feb. 8 to 10 at Marmer's home shul, Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, where he began attending programs as a young child.

Because he never went to Jewish day school, Marmer's involvement in the programs connected him to Jewish kids his age and solidified friendships with them, he said.

"It also gave me more of an opportunity to learn about the Jewish religion and Jewish culture... I think that aside from my bar mitzvah, the first time I read Torah was in USY, and actually my first aliyah before I had my bar mitzvah was part of a USY convention. It solidified my connection very early on, I think."

As well, he honed his leadership skills in the organization, eventually becoming USY's international communications vice-president.

For the last 2-1/2 years, Marmer served as youth coordinator at Shaar Shalom. Concurrently, he was also a staff adviser for ECRUSY at regional and international USY events.

As well, he was a Kadima adviser in London, when he attended the University of Western Ontario for a year before transferring to York.

Marmer said he likes to think USY programs "provide a safe space for teens to feel comfortable to express themselves. Nowadays, especially, teens are hit with so many different challenges in their lives."

Part of his work with youngsters, including summer day camp experience, has included a focus on anti-bullying "and trying to encourage kids to support their fellow teens and fellow youth."

In a USCJ press release, Pascoe said that Marmer "brings tremendous enthusiasm, terrific experience and a great track record of success in working with young people."

JNF telethon set

Compiled by CJN Staff

Jewish National Fund (JNF) kicks off its annual Tu b'Shvat – new year for the trees – telethon Feb. 3 to raise funds for the Kissufim Forest and recreation area in the Negev in southern Israel.

The funds will be used this year to redevelop the forest, which has been damaged by Hamas rocket fire, and thus encourage Israelis to enjoy the outdoors again and restore some psychological calm in an otherwise turbulent part of the country.

Southern Israel is often on the front lines during conflicts, and the effects from the stress may linger long after the rockets have ceased.

"While things may be calm on the surface in these communities, the trauma inflicted on residents can run deep and take its toll on parents and children," JNF executive director Lance Davis says.

The telethon, which reaches out to more than 5,000 homes in the GTA, takes place during the day on Sunday and on subsequent evenings from Feb. 4 to 8.

It is held at the JNF Toronto office, 1000 Finch Ave. W. More than 50 student and adult volunteers per shift are expected to take to the phones after a specialized training session. Volunteers are still welcome.

Winnipegger admits to antisemitic posters

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A failed candidate for Winnipeg city council has admitted to local media outlets that he was behind a series of posters titled "$hitler's List," which many have described as antisemitic.

In the posters, which first appeared in downtown Winnipeg just before Rosh Hashanah, the writer, Gordon Warren, was critical of Winnipeg's Jewish mayor, Sam Katz.

The flyers also included a list of names of mostly Jewish businesspeople in Manitoba's capital who either have business ties to Katz or are connected to the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, which is under construction here and was the brainchild of the late Jewish media mogul Israel Asper.

Warren ran for office unsuccessfully in the 2010 election. In an interview he gave at the time, he said he was running to "end waste and corruption at city hall."

He criticized Katz and city council for "entrusting our water and sewage treatment to Veolia, a French-based multinational conglomerate with an abysmal health and safety record and a notorious reputation that includes bribery of public officials, illegal political contributions, kickbacks, price-fixing and fraudulent accounting."

He added that he was committed to working against "ethically challenged people."

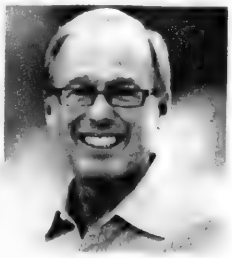
When asked if there was anything he would like to change in the city, Warren responded that "if Mayor Katz has taught Winnipeggers anything, it is that private interests must be kept separate from public interests."

He then referred to a number of city council decisions involving agreements with private companies.

"Whether it's Sam's dealings with Crocus, the MTS Centre cash giveaway to Mark Chipman, Sam's [Winnipeg] Goldeyes [baseball team] parking arrangement, the Asper stadium-mall-Bomber deal, or the more crucial secret water/waste management contract with Veolia, [city council] can't allow private, commercial interests to compromise Winnipeg's public interests ever again."

In his most recent e-mail to the news media, Warren said he put out the posters – a second batch appeared a couple of weeks after the first set were posted – because he felt he had no other choice, "as justice officials weren't willing to investigate a controversial land swap deal involving a city fire hall, and local Jewish and Zionist media" weren't accurately reporting what was going on.

"There was no one willing to do anything about it," Warren said.



Mayor Sam Katz was the focus of $hitler's List posters.

He compiled the names of Katz's business associates using Google. He claims he didn't realize most of the names on the list were Jewish until after the posters started appearing in public.

He also claims to have been shocked at the response to them. In a letter he sent anonymously a couple of months ago to Winnipeg's Jewish Post and News, he denied being antisemitic.

"$hitler's List" was supposed to be a take off on "Schindler's List," he wrote, referring to the Holocaust-themed book and Hollywood film of the same name.

Police announced last month that their investigation determined the posters broke no laws.

Katz was not available to comment on Warren's statements, but in a September interview, he said that he was "extremely saddened and disheartened" by the posters, and he had "faith the people of Winnipeg will not support such malice."

Warren, who is currently unemployed, conceded he was "pushing the envelope" with the posters and can understand why people might be offended by them.

He also said he's upset the posters took attention away from the issues he was trying to highlight.

Hamilton Jewish Federation hires new CEO

Abigail Cukier
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — The president of the Hamilton Jewish Federation said the organization had no choice but to hire its new CEO.

"Barb Babij was so superior in most of the criteria. We had to have her," Larry Szpirglas said. "She has great organizational skills, strong administration skills. She is taking the time to reach out to leadership in our community and is doing a wonderful job in that respect.

"She will be a strong professional presence and provide exemplary leadership in our community."

Babij came on board in November. Before that, she was a consultant in organizational development in Fort Erie, Ont. She is a CPA in New York state and a dual citizen of the United States and Canada, where she's lived since 1992.

"I wanted to be part of a larger Jewish community. I wanted to be able to give back to the community and do it in a Jewish way. This was a perfect fit," said Babij of her decision to join the Hamilton federation.

Other than living in Dundas for one year in the early 1990s, Babij is new to Hamilton, which is home to about 5,000 Jews.

"This is an extremely welcoming community. The best part of my job so far is, hands down, the people. They are so open and doing amazing things," said Babij, citing the PR committee, which strives to educate the broader community on Jewish issues, and the nationally recognized Holocaust education committee.

Babij believes the Hamilton federation needs to be more transparent.

"We need to do a better job educating people about our organization. Unless the federation is seen as part of the community, it's not going to do what it needs to do," she said.

"It's all about being able to help people in the community, in Hamilton and in Israel."

Babij says her first priority has been to get acquainted with the community. "I am listening and trying to understand where the community feels the path forward goes and how to get there."

JCC move to open Saturday mornings questioned

Rabbis say it sends wrong message to young people

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Council of Rabbis says the city's Rady Jewish Community Centre is sending the wrong message to young people about Jewish observance with its recent decision to open on Saturday mornings.

The rabbis – Alan Green (Shaarey Zedek Synagogue), Larry Lander (Congregation Etz Chayim), Neal Rose (the Simkin Centre) and Ari Ellis (Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue) – responded to the JCC's mid-December move with a Jan. 9 letter on the front page of the city's Jewish Post and News.

The rabbis said that they understand what prompted the decision to open at 8 a.m. instead of noon on Shabbat, as was the previous practice.

"We appreciate the obligation to serve the needs of Rady Centre members, many of whom are not Jewish, and the vast majority of whom are not Sabbath observant," they said. "We also appreciate that the decision to open Rady Centre facilities on Shabbat morning will have little if any impact on synagogue attendance on Shabbat morning."

Their objection, they said, is rooted in "the symbolism of this change," since the centre had "originally refrained from… opening on Shabbat" and later "from opening on Shabbat morning," which, they said, "signalled a laudable intent on the part of the community at least to acknowledge the ideal of Shabbat observance."

Rabbi Ari Ellis, right, with Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue president Earl Hershfield

They added that this intent was "praiseworthy… given that neither the administration nor the membership of the Rady Centre is oriented in a particularly Shabbasdik direction."

The rabbis said that such "decisions not only affect the current generation of Winnipeg Jews, but also, our generations yet unborn… How much further down this road is it prudent for us, as a community, to travel? And what kind of message are we currently sending to our young people, about the incorporation of Jewish values into their lives?"

Rabbi Ellis, whose congregation is Orthodox, told The CJN that the troubling JCC move raises the questions of "how important is Shabbat observance in our community and what kind of community do we want?"

In response to the rabbis' letter, JCC executive director Gayle Waxman noted that the majority of JCCs in North America are open Saturday mornings. "Most Canadian JCCs, including those in Toronto, Montreal and Calgary, are open Saturday mornings," she said.

Waxman said the JCC made the decision after extensive research and much consultation over a long period of time.

"We recognize that there are those who may not support this decision, and we respect that," she said. "We feel it's important to maintain a respectful dialogue within the community where all viewpoints are expressed."

She added that the majority of the feedback has been positive, from both Jewish and non-Jewish members.

In a statement on the centre's website, JCC president Eric Sawyer wrote, "I know that many members have indicated that they would like to work out on Saturday mornings, and I am pleased that we are able to respond to this request."

He added that "as is the current practice, there will be no exchange of money on Saturdays. Payment for any programs or services will need to be made prior to Shabbat."

Panel analyzes Israeli elections for students

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

While the votes were being cast and counted in the Israeli elections last week, Toronto students listened to a panel of three political scientists to learn more about the shifting Israeli political landscape.

University of Toronto Prof. Jeffrey Kopstein

The Jan. 22 panel at the Hillel Wolfond Centre, moderated by Meron Kali, a PhD candidate at the University of Toronto, consisted of Jeffrey Kopstein, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies and professor of political science at U of T, Oded Haklai, political studies professor at Queen's University, and Renan Levine, assistant professor of political science at U of T.

The event was planned by Hillel interns who wanted to provide their fellow students with a chance to discuss and understand Israel's democracy.

"Israel finds its way into the media on a daily basis and this panel gave us the opportunity to help people navigate the sometimes murky waters that comprise Israeli political media coverage," said Talia Rotman, Israel engagement co-ordinator at Hillel of Greater Toronto.

The panellists explained the differences between the Canadian electoral system and the Israeli one. The entire Israeli region is basically one big riding, Levine said. And although parties in Canada don't always win a majority, it still happens, whereas in Israel, no government has ever won 61 seats, enough to make a majority. That's why you see parties combining together in blocs if they want to pass any laws, he explained.

"The most competition tends to be within one bloc," Levine said. "The right-wing parties are just competing with other right-wing parties."

The panellists pointed out that this Israeli election was different from its predecessors: unlike previous ones, it did not primarily focus on the Arab-Israeli issue. "A strange thing happened – that issue was hardly discussed at all," Kopstein said. "This was the first 'Seinfeld' election – it appears to be an election about nothing."

He said the reason the Arab-Israeli issue did not play as much of a role in the election, and was not focused on by the candidates as much as previous years, is that many Israelis have lost hope for the peace process.

"Two-thirds of Israelis still favour a two-state solution," Kopstein told the group of about 40 students, "but way fewer believe it's possible."

Instead, domestic issues – like the role of religion and state, military service requirements, the skewed allocation of resources, the education system – were brought to the foreground, Haklai said. "The centre and left focused their campaign on these issues. Attacking [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu wasn't a priority."

While Kopstein said these social issues have always played a role in Israeli elections, this time they had a different tone. "I recall social issues coming up [in the past], but it was always in the context of 'we should be stronger so we can beat our enemies,'" he said. "The basic consensus is that [the Arab-Israeli and Palestinian issues] are not solvable, so it's just a waste of time."

A change – what many analysts say is a hardening – in the American-Israeli relationship with regard to security also played a role. "They didn't want to go too far because you've got to think about how it's going to play out in Washington, D.C.," Levine said.

New UdeM course studies Quebec Jews

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A small group of Université de Montréal (UdeM) students from disciplines as diverse as political science, anthropology and education began studies Jan. 22 on a subject of common interest: the Jews of Quebec.

The UdeM's theology and science of religions department has launched a course, the first of its kind at a francophone university, that asks the question: Who are the Jews of Quebec?

Taking the form of a multidisciplinary seminar, the course was limited to 15 students. They can earn three credits by the time it concludes in May.

"Culture et experience juives au Québec," as it is titled, was created and is being taught by Jean Duhaime, a theology professor specializing in the Hebrew Bible and ancient Judaism, with his colleague Alain Gignac, whose sphere is Christianity's New Testament.

The professors believe the Jews of Quebec are often misunderstood, and they hope this course will promote greater openness to the community and dialogue with its members.

They start from the premise that Jewish identity is varied and complex, with religious, cultural and philosophical elements, and that Jewish communities interact with and participate in the evolution of the societies they live in, Quebec being no exception.

The course examines how Jews have fared in this province, particularly within the francophone context. The students are looking at the origins and composition of the province's Jewish communities (the plural is used) today, and how they fit into Quebec's vision of vivre ensemble.

Guest lecturers are University of Ottawa history professor Pierre Anctil, an expert on the Quebec Jewish community, in particular its Yiddish culture; Yolande Cohen, a Université du Québec à Montréal history professor with expertise on Sephardim; former Canadian Jewish Congress Quebec president Victor Goldbloom, the province's first Jewish cabinet minister; the UdeM's Marie McAndrew, a professor of intercultural education and the Canada Research Chair in Ethnic Studies; Samuel Mercier, a graduate literature student who is doing his doctorate on Mordecai Richler; and Chantal Ringuet, who has done post-doctoral research in Canadian Jewish studies and is the author of A la découverte du Montréal yiddish."

All of these lectures are open to the public.

"We sometimes think that Jews are recent immigrants," said Duhaime, a veteran of interfaith dialogue. He wants to set his students straight by reminding them that "the first Jews arrived with the British troops in the 18th century."

He does not shrink from facing the antisemitism that pervaded Quebec's elite and political class, especially before World War II. But the current atmosphere, he believes, is a desire for rapprochement, despite the opposition to Israeli policies among some Quebecers.

"We still strongly associate [Jews] with the anglophone community, but about 40 per cent of them are francophones, of which a good part come from the Maghreb," Gignac noted. "They are very open to the Quebec reality and are more and more fostering exchange and integration initiatives."

His 15 years of Christian-Jewish dialogue, Duhaime said, "has permitted me to appreciate a little more [the community's] diversity and dynamic contribution to Quebec society.

"In the context of today's religious and cultural pluralism, it seemed to me useful to deepen and to share this experience."

He adds, "It must not be forgotten that the Jewish and Christian cultures have a common base, at least in the sacred texts. We share the same book which Christians call the Old Testament and Jews the Tanach or Hebrew Bible."

Students are expected to produce a research paper to be delivered orally toward the end of the course, as well as submitted in written form.

The upcoming public lectures scheduled so far are: Feb. 5, Yolande Cohen; Feb. 19, Pierre Anctil; and March 12, Marie McAndrew, all at 4 p.m. at the UdeM's Pavillon Marguerite d'Youville, 2375 Côte Ste. Catherine Rd.

Cohen will speak about Jewish immigration from North Africa to Canada, particularly Quebec, in the 1960s following the end of European colonization. The arrival of these Sephardi Jews, mostly Moroccans, she argues, profoundly changed the Montreal Jewish community.

She will look at the Sephardi community's evolution and the challenges it faces today, contrasting its situation with the community in France.

When Orthodox scholarship is neither

When first referred to Prof. Martin Lockshin's book review ("A book for the thoughtful, 'skeptical' Orthodox," Jan. 10), I was curious. Works by Orthodox authors that tackle difficult theological issues, ask tough questions, and reconcile differences between Orthodoxy and modern scholarship are always of interest to Jews who straddle both worlds. Such works are often a kiddush HaShem, because they demonstrate how Orthodoxy and scholarship are compatible. Orthodox scholars such as Rabbi David Berger, Rabbi Lawrence Schiffman, Prof. Menachem Kellner, and yes, Rabbi Martin Lockshin, admirably synthesize devout personal religiosity with academic rigour. With a title touting a book that would be helpful to such a "skeptical" Orthodox Jew, I read on.

Guest Voice

Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin

But about halfway through the article, something was seriously wrong. The book, Torah from Heaven, by former Orthodox rabbi Norman Solomon, was ostensibly about how to reconcile traditional Judaism's claim that the Torah scroll we read in synagogue contains the same text given by God to Moses at Mount Sinai, in light of scholarship of the last two centuries that argues the text has been altered over time.

But the article began to stray off topic. Rabbi Lockshin quoted a passage from the book citing a 20th-century Israeli chief rabbi who had interpreted a talmudic passage literally and as a result rejected modern medicine. But wait: the Talmud is a rabbinic commentary to the Torah, written centuries after it was canonized. What in the world did a modern rabbi's fundamentalist interpretation of the Talmud have to do with Bible criticism?

I quickly realized that Rabbi Solomon's work was much broader than the subject of Bible criticism. And 150 pages into the book (the reader is left guessing for some time what it's actually about), I discovered that the author actually has three problems with Orthodox theology: (a) the integrity of the written Torah text; (b) the claim that the rabbinic oral tradition is an accurate explanation of the written biblical text (hence the passage about the Talmud); and (c) the Bible contains certain values and teachings that run counter to modern morality, such as the command to wage war with idolatrous nations and the ban on homosexuality. This flawed morality, argues the author, proves that the Bible is not the real word of God.

Rabbi Solomon is a product of both traditional Orthodox yeshivot and the university. After spending years as an Orthodox pulpit rabbi, he retired and went into academia. (I know all this because the author first presents his autobiographical "orientation." He wants the reader to sympathize with his conflicts, and, I suspect, he wants to impress Orthodox skeptics that he's one of the guys.)

Rabbi Solomon then spends the bulk of the book regurgitating what he's learned of Bible criticism from the university, as well as what he remembers of traditional Torah commentary from the yeshiva. Along the way, he takes swipes at much of traditional Torah literature, from rejecting the entire corpus of Kabbalah as being fanciful and outlandish to attacking one of the greatest rabbinic minds of the 20th-century, Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, for overemphasizing the halachic nature of the Torah. Clearly, a man with "issues."

Reading page after page of this disputation with tradition, I was hoping that at some point he would find a way to neatly reconcile his Orthodox faith with all the presented challenges. He had, after all, raised many valid questions that deserved careful and methodical analysis.

But alas, this was not to be. In the last section of the book, where the great "reconciliation" is offered, an entire chapter is titled, "What is Truth?" Rabbi Solomon therein suggests that despite the utter falsehood of the Bible's historical and moral claims, despite his contention that it isn't really the word of God dictated to Moses, the Bible could still be "true" in some other sense. Now, this may pass as profundity in some circles, but for me it brought back memories of former U.S. president Bill Clinton's attempt to define what "is" is. The Bible's claim to be the word of God, presented to real Jews at a real Mount Sinai three millennia ago, is either true or false. Make up your mind.

But Rabbi Solomon feels that there's a way to parse the gap between truth and falsehood by suggesting that the Bible, when read as a "myth," (i.e., "tangible formulations of abstract ideas") is true, even though its "historical claims" are false. To arrive at the end of a book claiming serious biblical scholarship and have it end with poetic esotericism and philosophical waxing was not only anti-climatic, it was downright frustrating. Scholarship this isn't.

I am left confused by Rabbi Lockshin's review. To his credit, nowhere does Rabbi Solomon claim to reconcile his Orthodoxy with his newfound belief in the Torah as myth. Indeed, after examining the stated creed of the movement for Reform Judaism, one concludes that Rabbi Solomon has become a Reform Jew. And that's fine; people change all the time, and he wouldn't be the first Orthodox Jew to leave the fold and become "enlightened" (although he is about two centuries late). But why Rabbi Lockshin feels this book is appropriate for Orthodox Jews with questions is utterly perplexing. This is not a book that will reconcile your Orthodoxy with modern scholarship. It rather tells you to reject everything you learned in yeshiva or seminary as utter drivel, and to reject those Orthodox rabbis whose lack of wisdom prevents them from seeing the truth.

Fortunately, there is a plethora of real scholarship, written by Orthodox scholars, that proves Rabbi Solomon wrong. It is quite possible and laudable to reconcile one's Orthodoxy with one's intellectual skepticism, and it is a project to which I and other rabbis and scholars have dedicated our lives. As my colleague in this endeavour, I hope that Rabbi Lockshin will reconsider his unqualified endorsement of Rabbi Solomon's book.

Rabbi Korobkin is senior rabbi at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

Bathurst Bowlerama + Reena = a Winning Team

Members of the Reena team that made it to the Nationals of the last Special Olympics World Games:

For the last 23 years, Reena has been utilizing Bathurst Bowlerama to run its Special Olympics Bowling League. Every Wednesday night, individuals meet at the alley to chat with their friends, have a bite to eat and practice their skills. The bowling league has always found the alley to be a safe space where each individual can be themselves.

Over the years, ownership of the location has changed many times, but each new owner has continued the keen interest and strong support Reena has enjoyed at Bathurst Bowlerama. The bowling alley staff are always friendly and welcoming, and they have made an effort to become part of the Reena family. When our Reena Bowlers walk into the alley, they immediately feel part of the team as the bowling alley staff are there to joke with them, laugh with them and ensure that they have a fun time! The athletes have developed strong relationships with the staff to the point where they have developed their own hand signals to communicate with one another.

There is no doubt that this very positive spirit has paid a large part in the many successes our Special Olympics Bowling League has enjoyed over the years. We want to take this opportunity to thank the management and Wednesday night staff at Bathurst Bowlerama for being fun, energetic and most of all supportive to each and every one of our athletes.

למותר לציין שהתמלאתי שמחה גדולה לגלות שטעיתי בגדול! מסתבר שלחמשת מילין הישראלים הבוחרים הגיעו מים עד נפש, ומפלס הגועל נפש שלהם מהמפלגות ששלטו במדינה גרם להם לבחור באלטרנטיבה צעירה, מתונה, מודרנית ומתקדמת.

AMOUR

הסרט "אהבה" של הבמאי האוסטרי מייקל הנקה, מביא למסך שני שחקנים צרפתיים מעולים בגיל שמונים לחייהם, לתאר את ימיהם האחרונים והדעיכה בעקבות האירוע המוחי של הגיבורה.

זהו אחד הסרטים השלמים ביותר שנראו בשנים האחרונות. הבמאי מראה את המציאות ללא כחל וסרק, בצורה נקיה וכנה והמושג אהבה מקבל משמעויות שלא חשבנו עליה בעבר. הסרט זכה עד כה בכל פרס אפשרי ולמרות היותו אירופאי,הוא מועמד לארבעה פרסי אוסקר, כולל הסרט והשחקנית הטובים ביותר. הוא יהיה ללא ספק הזוכה הוודאי בפרס האוסקר לסרט הזר.

למרות שהנושא נשמע לרבים מיכם בלתי אפשרי- אני ממליץ בחום לראות את "אהבה"- הוא יספר לכם משהו שאתם חייבים לדעת על החיים שלכם.

Inventing words to demonize Israel

My View

Lawrence Hart

Just when it seems that every conceivable strategy for demonizing Israel has been exploited, along comes a new vehicle that's every bit as toxic as what's already out there, perhaps even more so.

Wrapped in an intentionally complex and confusing vernacular that's impossible for anyone but its staunchest adherents to fully understand, this new-fangled language of incitement and vilification appears to be rooted in two separate, though sometimes intersecting, terms: "homonationalism" and "pinkwashing."

Though both of these constructs began to creep into the English language after 9/11, with particular linkage to dynamics within gay political culture in the United States, their more recent application has been directed, with much greater venom, toward Israel.

It's difficult to find any definition of these words that is not cloaked in the most absurd of jargon. One of the simpler descriptions is contained in promotional material for an upcoming conference sponsored by the Center for Lesbian and Gay Studies at the City University of New York (CUNY). Homonationalism, according to this source, "occurs when sub-sectors of specific gay communities achieve legal parity with heterosexuals and then embrace racial and religious supremacy ideologies." Pinkwashing is "using rights protections for one group (in this case gay and lesbian people) to conceal rights abuses against another group."

In relation to Israel, the insinuation is that the state's protection of gay rights, and its marketing of particularly Tel Aviv as a gay-friendly destination, is nothing more than a callous ploy to conceal persistent violations of human rights for Palestinians and divert attention from the "occupation" of Palestinian lands.

Two of the major proponents of this latest verbiage to malign Israel are CUNY professor Sarah Schulman and Jasbir Puar, associate professor of gender studies at Rutgers University in New Jersey.

Puar was at McMaster University recently delivering a lecture titled "Ecologies of Sensation, Sensational Ecologies: Sex and Disability in the Israeli Occupation of Palestine." First, as expected, she accosted her audience with an array of unsubstantiated allegations against Israel and its people. Then, using pinkwashing as her fulcrum, she waded into an even more warped and appalling diatribe, accusing Israelis of systematized pronatalism (the policy of encouraging higher birthrates to ensure population growth), the promotion of eugenics and selective abortion, and sanctioned neglect of physically and mentally disabled children.

What was alarming, though plain to see, is that under the guise of purported "scholarship," and by craftily applying layers of unnecessary complexity to what essentially boils down to the base language of hateful propaganda, Puar has helped to open an as yet under-explored, but nonetheless deeply troubling, vista. If unchecked, it will no doubt expand in scope as it strives to discredit not only Israel's enviable record of protecting and promoting gay rights, but also its more widespread contributions in so many other areas as well, both domestically and globally.

It's clear that in Puar's perspective, there is little that Israel does that is not designed merely as a distraction from its alleged – though in her opinion deliberate and brutal – oppression of Palestinians. Her linguistic manipulations, which speak to a perfidy and an inversion of reality that have no place in honest discourse, need to be robustly challenged.

Scrolling through the scrolls

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Announced with great fanfare late last year, Google, along with the custodians of the Dead Sea Scrolls, have photographed, digitized and released online what has been called the most important archeological find of the 20th century. Now that the dust has settled on the project (actually projects), here is a guide for viewing the scrolls – and why you really need to visit two sites in order to get the full picture.

Although it may not be immediately apparent from the publicity or the various websites, the Dead Sea Scrolls are actually overseen by two Israeli institutions. As the excellent Wikipedia entry explains: "Apart from the first seven scrolls, which are entrusted to the Israel Museum, the majority of the fragments found by archeologists and Bedouin are property of the Israel Antiquities Authority... Both [digitized web] sites were developed with co-operation with Google Israel R&D centre."

STOP 1: The Dead Sea Scrolls Digital Project at the Israel Museum

The Israeli Museum has digitized five of its scrolls: The Temple Scroll, The War Scroll, The Community Rule Scroll, The Commentary on Habakkuk and The Great Isaiah Scroll. Each scroll is introduced by videos featuring Adolfo Roitman, a curator with dramatic flair. Here's what Roitman says as he says standing in the vault containing The Great Isaiah Scroll: "You are in a very special place. Right now you are at the Holy of Holies of the Shrine of the Book where the Dead Sea Scrolls are kept. Let's see. Come with me."

The actual digitization is magnificent. You can zoom in to examine the lettering and every crease, tear and sinew in the parchment. Navigation is smooth and intuitive. The Great Isaiah Scroll even has context-sensitive English translation. Click on a line in the parchment and the English appears alongside.

The site itself is trilingual: English, Hebrew and (a surprise to me) Chinese. [http://bit.ly/scrolls4]

STOP 2: The Leon Levy Dead Sea Scrolls Digital Library at the Israel Antiquities Authority

This is my favourite site. Before you get the scrolls themselves, there is a marvellous, detailed (yet not overly scholarly) explanation about the history of the texts, their discovery and conservation, and equally impressive, an overview of how the digitization process was done. As for the scrolls, you can look over featured gems such as The Ten Commandments, The Minor Prophets, Psalms and a pair of tfillin.

Don't miss the incredible "Explore the Archive" section that allows you to search for such keywords as "Genesis" or browse by content (scripture, poetical/ liturgical texts, etc.), language (Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek, Nabatean, Latin and Arabic) or site of discovery. Sometimes you'll just look at a tiny fragment, but that only underlines the incredible work the researchers have done to preserve and identify all these treasures. This project will be completed in 2016.

The site is bilingual: English and Hebrew with Arabic "coming soon." [http://bit.ly/scrolls5]

I will leave the final word about this remarkable project to Shuka Dorfman, director of the Israel Antiquities Authority: "Only five conservators worldwide are authorized to handle the Dead Sea Scrolls. Now, everyone can 'touch' the scrolls on-screen around the globe." [http://bit.ly/scrolls7]

A canopy of love and commitment

Rabbi Mark Fishman

"The whole nation trembled... and they stood under the mountain. And Mount Sinai was completely enveloped in smoke because the Lord descended upon it in fire... and the whole mountain trembled exceedingly" (Exodus 19:16-18).

It sounds scary. Yet the kabbalistic interpretation of this verse transforms a moment of fear and trembling into a sacred marriage of love and commitment.

When the Bible reports that the "whole nation... stood under the mountain," Rashi comments, "The Almighty held the mountain over them like a canopy," threatening them with death if they would not accept the Commandments. The Zohar, however, interprets that the mountain was not held over them as a canopy of coercion, but rather as a canopy of commitment, a chupah of love and marriage.

This idea even affects how we pray our different Amidot on Shabbat. The evening Amidah evokes the Shabbat of Creation, citing the Biblical verses, "And the heavens and the earth and all of their hosts were completed."

It's the woman-bride who is endowed with the major spark of the Divine creativity, since she nurtures the fetus in her womb and actually gives birth to the child. The Kabbalat Shabbat Friday evening prayer features the Shchinah, the feminine aspect of the Divine. The Eshet Chayil (literally, Woman of Valor) Shabbat evening song actually refers to the Shchinah, and in the Lecha Dodi chant, we go out to greet the Shabbat bride.

Moreover, in the Shabbat evening Amidah, we ask that "All of Israel who sanctify Your Name shall rest in Her [vah]," using a feminine pronoun, and the leader of the Sabbath table first slices the bottom challah (of two challot), which likewise symbolizes the woman. No wonder the betrothal ceremony opens with the bride representing God and encompassing the groom!

Rabbinic Reflections

The morning Amidah evokes the Sabbath of Revelation, describing the glory of Moses as he descended from Mount Sinai. In the act of Revelation, it was the masculine aspect of God that was dominant, the God groom who chose His bride Israel and gave her His contract of marriage. Therefore, in the Sabbath morning Amidah, we ask that "all of Israel who sanctify Your Name shall rest in Him [vo]," using the male pronoun. Accordingly, the upper challah symbolizing the male is sliced first. And so it's traditionally the male who gives the ring – as well as the marriage contract – to his bride.

The concluding Sabbath afternoon Amidah pictures the Sabbath of Redemption, when "You [God] are one and Your Name is one. This can only come about when the masculine and feminine aspects of the Divine, when God and His bride Israel, act in concert together to bring about the perfection of the world. In this Amidah, we ask that "all of Israel who sanctify your Name shall rest in them [vam]," using a plural pronoun, and the leader of the third meal slices both challot together.

The parallel to the wedding celebration is the yihud (marital home), where bride and groom live together as one in harmony and equality, with neither dominating the other.

So, a passage of fear is really a song of love.

Rabbi Mark Fishman is assistant rabbi of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Montreal.

It's necessary to express grief

Over the years it has been my sad duty to officiate at many funerals. I have met with families in their moments of deepest grief. I have witnessed many approaches to sorrow. From this broad experience, certain basic ideas and concepts have emerged.

In the first place, I have learned that it is good and necessary for a person to express grief. This sounds simple enough. But there is a tendency in our age to be ashamed of showing our feelings. When we call upon a friend who has sustained a loss, we try to talk about everything except the reality of death. Death is uncomfortable. It disturbs us; we want as little anxiety as possible.

We may not accept all the teachings of modern psychology, but this much is certainly true: when we repress our natural emotions, we create abnormal reactions. Often these emerge later in life as physical pain or mental distress.

Secondly, there is a widespread tendency to say what is improper to a person who is mourning.

Out of mistaken goodwill, we say that time is a great healer, or that God works in mysterious ways, or that love will come again.

These well-meant platitudes leave the mourner confused and disconcerted. After all, the sorrow is genuine and real, and the mourner needs to feel and express it.

The Talmud advises that the comforters should not utter words of consolation until the mourner speaks.

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

In the third place, it is necessary to respond to the challenge of life, to pick up the threads of daily existence once again. Unwisely, some mourners withdraw into a realm of exaggerated grief and excessive mourning. They wrap around themselves the gloomy garments of extended sorrow, rather than face the truth that life must go on.

Shakespeare wrote "Moderate lamentation is the right of the dead; excessive grief the enemy of the living."

Rabbi Jacob Rudin left us these thoughtful words, "To ask of death that it never come is futile, but it is not futility to pray that when death does come, it may takes us from a world, one corner of which is a little better because we were there."

Wisdom would suggest that this is the true purpose of the shivah period. After a period of acute sorrow, we are brought back slowly to ongoing problems. Life is a gift, and to die emotionally or spiritually with the loss of a loved one is to compound or double the loss.

Finally, in contemplating the life of a loved one, the values that really matter and persist are character, integrity, reputation and family relationships.

A good character is the fruit of personal exertion. We don't inherit it from our parents. It doesn't come to us automatically because of where we live, or how much formal education we possess, or the nature of our work, or the size of our income.

After our time on Earth, we carry nothing away with us except the memory of our character, our good deeds and our good name.

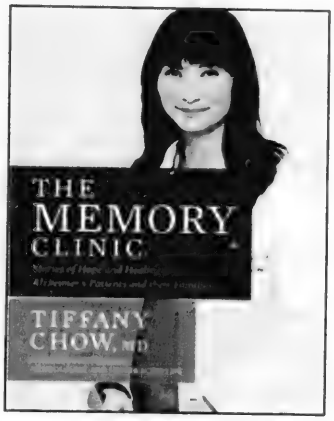
Baycrest doctor writes Alzheimer memoir

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter



Dr. Tiffany Chow, a behavioural neurologist in the Sam and Ida Ross Memory Clinic at Baycrest, has her own story to tell about Alzheimer's disease.

In her recent book, The Memory Clinic, Stories of Hope and Healing for Alzheimer's Patients and Their Families, (published by Penguin Group Canada) Chow said that she only recently figured out that her grandmother in Hawaii died of Alzheimer's, but without the typical memory loss symptoms.

Her grandmother died of a brain hemorrhage in 1995, but Chow said it was only after years of clinical training and experience with Alzheimer's patients that she recognized the details of her grandmother's illness were consistent with Alzheimer's.

Chow began to wonder if she, too, could ward off the effects of Alzheimer's by building up her own cognitive reserve, just like her grandmother did.

"I tried to discover how my grandmother kept her Alzheimer's asymptomatic. What did she do, or not do?"

Chow, 46, a married stepmother of two boys, 7 and 8, said she didn't go into medicine wanting to work with Alzheimer's patients, "but realized I enjoyed being in close contact with patients and their families.

"I'm in on a more intimate side of people's lives. I also have a soft spot for older couples. I like seeing how their marriages succeed, and I love the way they care for each other. I often see a connection, even when there is no talking. I get to observe beautiful moments."

Chow said her literary agent, who urged her to write the book, found it fascinating "that a young, lively person like me enjoyed working with older people."

She wanted Chow to write a personal book that talks about her resolve to lessen her risk for the disease – she balances her career, with family, regular exercise and healthy eating – and about the life lessons she learns from her patients and their families.

The book, which is written for the layperson, has two distinct messages, Chow said. "First is for the caregiver. Pace yourself and receive help gracefully.

"At the end of the day, the caregiver has done a good job if the patient is pain-free, safe, and having some enjoyable moments. Burnout comes when the caregiver thinks they are not doing enough."

Chow said she learns a lot from the caregivers, and their stories are told throughout the book.

"They are the experts on each individual person. Part of what I do is make them feel empowered," Chow said. "They are an important role on our team. We help set them up for success."

There is less stress when everyone works together, she said. Social networking does the most good.

The book's second message, Chow said, is prevention. "What [changes] can you make to your lifestyle that are sustainable for you to do now and for the rest of your life? Ask yourself, 'What should I start and what should I stop?'"

She includes chapters on thinking before you eat, managing stress, and physical activity and the body-mind connection. "I follow the idea of moderation. I like red meat, and although I'm very mindful, I'm not perfect."

Rabbi was a pioneer in the Soviet Jewry movement

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rabbi Martin Penn, whose eloquent advocacy for Soviet Jewish emigration inspired many Montrealers to work for the cause in the 1970s and '80s, is remembered for his courage and perseverance.

He died on Jan. 21, his 63rd birthday, after a long illness.

Rabbi Penn's exceptional oratorical skills and dynamic activism were cut short in 1994 after he suffered a devastating stroke at age 44. Initially, he was unable to speak, walk or even read.

Over the years, he battled to regain some of his abilities.

Despite his diminished speech and mobility, Rabbi Penn continued the rabbinical career he embarked upon at the relatively late age of 40. At his death, he was co-rabbi of Congregation Shomrim Laboker in Montreal, where he had served since 1991.

He had previously been the director of Canadian Jewish Congress's Canadian committee for Soviet Jewry and head of its international affairs department.

At the standing-room only funeral, Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz recalled how his charismatic friend of more than 35 years passionately spoke out for the freedom of Soviet Jewry in front of the Soviet consulate on du Musée Avenue time and time again, leading throngs of demonstrators.

"The slogan 'Let my people go' is synonymous with Marty Penn," Rabbi Zeitz said.

Rabbi Penn's activism went back to the earliest days of the movement – "when this issue was not on the establishment's agenda" – as a leader of the Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry. After studying at McGill University, he received his bachelor's and master's degrees from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, specializing in 20th-century European Jewry.

Rabbi Penn visited the Soviet Union several times in the 1970s and '80s, and was one of the first foreigners to meet Jews in its central Asian region, Rabbi Zeitz said. On one trip to Russia, he was assaulted on the street and returned home visibly injured.

He was also a founder of the Canadian Parliamentary Group for Soviet Jewry, to which the majority of members of Parliament belonged in the '80s.

Rabbi Zeitz noted that his friend later turned his attention to helping Ethiopian Jews emigrate to Israel, the welfare of Jews in eastern Europe and the fight for justice for Jews from Arab lands.

He placed Rabbi Penn among the "giants" of those who worked doggedly for the good of "the forgotten Jews" of the world. In 2000, Rabbi Penn received the inaugural Alan Rose Human Rights Award from CJC.

Shimon Fogel, chief executive officer of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, knew Rabbi Penn, who was older, all his life and worked with him at CJC for some years.

Fogel said the leadership role Canada played internationally in the Soviet Jewry movement can be attributed in large part to Rabbi Penn's efforts.

"Marty was an icon… He is the one figure who was ever-present and had a huge influence on the direction the movement took."

Rabbi Zeitz lauded Rabbi Penn's stoicism over the last 18 years of his life as he dealt with disability and chronic illness. In 2010, Rabbi Penn began treatment for multiple myeloma, a blood cancer for which there is no cure.

"He would say, 'Why, why, why?' and then, 'What can you do?' He meant why was I prevented from fulfilling my mission?" Rabbi Zeitz recalled.

Despite his limited speech, Rabbi Penn continued to be a gifted communicator and educator, both at his shul and to medical students, whom he taught about his condition, relying on his hands and facial expressions to fill the verbal gaps.

Shomrim Laboker's other co-rabbi, Yonah Rosner, who was in Israel, sent the message that his colleague was "a doer, a man of action and conviction."

Rabbi Martin Penn

He called Rabbi Penn "a profile in courage" for his determination to return to the shul after the stroke and participate to the fullest extent possible.

"The balabotim [regular worshippers] would help him put on his tallit and open his siddur for him," he said, illustrating the respect that was accorded Rabbi Penn.

Among Rabbi Penn's volunteer work was helping establish in 1992 a local support group for Migdal Ohr, a charitable organization that helps underprivileged children and immigrants in Israel.

Rabbi Zeitz also remembered his friend's private side – his sense of humour, his antics and practical jokes before his illness. He loved all kinds of music and was present at John Lennon and Yoko Ono's famous "bed-in" at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel in 1969.

Fogel said that on his frequent trips to Israel, he still hears from former Refuseniks like Natan Sharansky and Yuli Edelstein how central a figure Rabbi Penn was in their lives, and how much they attribute their liberation and success in Israeli public life to him.

"Marty was able to capture people's imaginations and motivate them. That is quite a legacy," Fogel said.

Rabbi Penn is survived by his son Jeremy, his parents Leon and Florence Penn, his siblings Roslyn and Harold, and their families.

Funeral director was 'compassionate'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Greg Gates, general manager of Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, who died suddenly on Jan. 11 at age 60, will be remembered as a guardian of the Jewish tradition.

Gates, who is not Jewish, began working at Benjamin's 40 years ago as a junior funeral director. He died of a heart attack on his way home from work. He lived in Barrie with his wife of 38 years, Joan, and their son, Gary, 20.

Michael Benjamin, president of the funeral chapel, said Gates was so familiar with Jewish traditions that people frequently mistook him for being Jewish and sometimes even thought he was a rabbi.

"He was compassionate, caring, loyal, and dedicated to the families. He comes from the 'old school' and this was his calling."

Greg Gates

Benjamin said Gates' funeral was in Sarnia, where Gates was from. More than 30 staff members, former Benjamin's employees and some rabbis attended. "He really touched people."

Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, wrote on Benjamin's website that he was privileged to know Gates for more than 30 years.

"For families in their hours of grief, for colleagues and clergy working with him, he was invariably the right man in the right place at the right time. He combined sensitivity with competency, understanding and efficiency," Rabbi Scheim wrote.

"His gentle, yet authoritative voice provided comfort and direction in numerous circumstances. I add my name to the long list of those who will miss him greatly."

Howard Mammon, executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Parks, wrote on the website that they often worked together during difficult circumstances. "His professionalism, sensitivity and care for the families we both served were exemplary," Mammon said.

Mammon, who met with Gates a few hours before his death, said that he "appreciated his insights on various issues affecting the bereavement sector."

Joan Gates said in an interview that her husband was passionate about his own family and about the Benjamin's family.

"We were married for 15 years before our 'miracle' baby was born, and Greg was the perfect father. Anyone who knew him knew about Gary."

Gates said that her husband was a happy man. "He loved his work and he loved us. He didn't need anything else," she said.

"I take comfort that he left his mark. When we had Gary, my first call was from a rabbi to congratulate us, and when Greg died, [one of the first calls] was from a rabbi."

When her husband was on call and people would call in the middle of the night, she said, "he was kind and compassionate. He would put them at ease, and he told them he was always there. They often called back just to talk a little more."

Besides his wife and son, Gates leaves his brother and sister-in-law John and Heather.

Antisemitic rhetoric of Greek neo-Nazi party hardening

JTA

ATHENS — The Greek neo-Nazi party Golden Dawn said a visit to Greece by American Jewish Committee leader David Harris is meant to ensure further "Jewish influence over Greek political issues" and safeguard the interests of "international loan sharks."

Harris, the executive director of the AJC, is leading a Jewish delegation to the region that is meeting with several Greek leaders, including Prime Minister Antonis Samaras. During the meetings, Harris expressed his "concern and solidarity for Greece during the crisis."

The statement from Golden Dawn, posted on the party's website Jan. 24, slammed the Greek government for giving Harris high-level access. "Just from the meetings, one can understand the influence of international Judaism on the Greek political scene," the statement said. "The political leadership will once again express its total subjugation to the whims of the 'chosen' people."

It also derided Harris.

"The only solidarity of this gentleman is to his compatriots – the international loan sharks, who are humiliating the Greek people. His concern most likely is related to the inability of Greece to make the payments of the predatory interest rates of the vile loans," it said. "We do not need the crocodile tears of a Jew."

Golden Dawn swept into the Greek parliament with 19 lawmakers in last year's elections, campaigning on an anti-austerity, anti-immigrant platform, preying on the fears of Greeks who have seen the country flooded with immigrants amid a terrible recession. Greek and international Jewish groups repeatedly have condemned Golden Dawn as racist and antisemitic.

Its leader, Nikolaos Michaloliakos, uses the Heil Hitler salute and has denied the existence of gas chambers at Nazi death camps during World War II. Another lawmaker read a passage from the antisemitic forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

The attack on Harris and a separate article titled Absolute Evil that was published on the party's website Jan. 25 appeared to be a hardening of Golden Dawn's antisemitic rhetoric, apparently in anger over pressure from Jewish groups to get the Greek government to reign in the party. The statement said that blaming Golden Dawn for Greece's woes constituted an attempt to divert attention from the real culprits for Greece's financial crisis.

"They are none other than those who possess most of the international wealth. The people behind the international loan sharks," the statement said. "Everyone knows they belong to a certain race, which presents itself as a victim, while in reality it is the perpetrator. Everyone knows that they are none other than those pulling the strings behind the marionettes. They are the absolute evil for mankind."

The second statement ended with a threat.

"The time will come when the nationalists of the Golden Dawn will take revenge like the horsemen of the storm, and all of them, being the absolute evil, will pay!"

The increasing violence in Greece has been the subject of fierce condemnation by the European Jewish community. On Jan. 22, the head of the European Jewish Congress, Moshe Kantor, said the "racist" killing of an immigrant in Athens was a result of Greece tolerating the neo-Nazi Golden Dawn party.

In related news, Martin Schulz, the president of the European Parliament, said the continent's Jews are living in fear.

"Yes, Jews are living in fear in Europe. Yes, there are threats," Schulz said. "But, ladies and gentlemen – why are we not [living in 1929]? Because there is a European Parliament. Because there are common European institutions. Because a consequence was taken after the Second World War – after its deepest point of civilization represented by Auschwitz."

Major explosion rocks Iranian nuclear plant

Yoel Goldman and Yifa Yaakov
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israeli intelligence officials have confirmed that a major explosion has rocked an Iranian nuclear facility, according to a report Monday in the Times of London.

The British daily cited officials in Tel Aviv who said the blast occurred last week, as originally reported on wnd.com.

Iran isn't believed to have evacuated the area around the Fordo plant, according to the Israeli sources, who said an investigation into the blast was ongoing.

"We are still in the preliminary stages of understanding what happened and how significant it is," one Israeli official told the London Times.

He didn't know if the explosion was "sabotage or accident" and refused to comment on reports that Israeli aircraft were seen nearby at the time of the blast.

On Sunday, two senior Iranian officials dismissed reports of the explosion. The deputy head of the Iranian Atomic Energy Agency said there had been no explosion at the facility whatsoever, the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported, while the chair of the Iranian parliament's committee for foreign policy and national security said rumours of the blast were "western-made propaganda" and "baseless lies" meant to affect talks on Iran's nuclear program.

The original wnd.com report on Friday claimed that a blast deep within Fordo Jan. 21 "destroyed much of the installation and trapped about 240 personnel deep underground," citing information from a former intelligence officer who it said used to work with the Islamic regime's Ministry of Intelligence and National Security.

The article said the blast "shook facilities within a radius of three miles," that Iranian security forces had "enforced a no-traffic radius of 15 miles," that the Tehran-Qom highway was shut down for several hours after the blast, and that, "as of [last] Wednesday afternoon [Jan. 23], rescue workers had failed to reach the trapped personnel." It said U.S. officials were aware of the explosion.

Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, but that claim has been rejected by much of the international community. The regime's consistent refusal to allow international inspectors into the Fordo nuclear facility has frustrated western powers and the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Meanwhile, an Iranian diplomat who defected in Norway in 2010 warned Israel last Friday that if Iran got the bomb, it would use it against the Jewish state.

In an interview with Israel's Channel 2 TV, Mohammad Reza Heydari, the former Iranian consul in Oslo who resigned and obtained political asylum there three years ago, said that "If Iran is given more time, it will acquire the knowledge necessary to build a nuclear bomb within a year." Asked whether it would use the bomb against Israel, he said: "If Iran gets to the point where it has an atomic bomb, it will certainly use it, against Israel or any other [enemy] country."

Mohammad Reza Heydari

Heydari, who defected soon after he was asked to identify his son in photos taken during protests that followed the 2009 vote that re-elected Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, said Tehran was aiming to develop two or three bombs and sees nuclear weapons as "insurance" to guarantee its survival.

Regime leaders "believe that when they acquire a nuclear bomb, [others] will start to behave toward them as they do toward North Korea," Heydari said.

Heydari, who also served as an diplomat in Georgia and Germany, said he knew of civilian planes from South America arriving with no passengers but with weapons and material for the nuclear program. He spoke of uranium purchased for and transported to Iran by Venezuela.

In related news, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad called Sunday on the Muslim world to unite to eradicate Zionism, which he called "corrupt, uncultured and murderous." Ahmadinejad spoke in Tehran to the 26th International Islamic Unity Conference, which coincided with International Holocaust Remembrance Day.

Yair Lapid wins big

3. But his Likud party is a big loser

Likud held 27 seats in the last Knesset. Now it will have only 20 – out of the 31-strong incoming Likud-Beiteinu faction. Brace for lots of bitterness in Likud. Lots of recriminations. The partnership with Avigdor Lieberman meant that Netanyahu heads the biggest faction, so that's good for him. But Likud lost right-wing votes to Naftali Bennett's Jewish Home and Yisrael Beiteinu lost Russian votes to Yesh Atid.

4. Yair Lapid is a resounding success

At its height, Yosef (Tommy) Lapid's secular Shinui party managed 15 Knesset seats. In his first foray into politics, son Yair has outstripped that achievement, with a gentler, more gracious approach. He's the power broker now. Netanyahu can barely cobble together a coalition without him, and doesn't want to. But voters took a gamble on Lapid, and he could turn out to be a disaster. We'll see how effectively he can stand up for his principles, notably his insistence on achieving universal conscription, and how well he can manoeuvre among the experienced political sharks. It's hard to imagine that many Israelis who think of themselves as coming from the centre or centre-right of the spectrum would have backed a Yesh Atid that was allied with centre-left and left-wing parties, but many such voters clearly did opt for his independent party. His repeated declarations that he was not hostile to haredi Jews, however much derided by commentators and doubted by the haredim themselves, may well have boosted him too. He also wisely steered well away from his Machiavellian family friend Ehud Olmert.

5. There may actually be an Israeli political centre

Lapid's party has taken 19 seats from all over the spectrum, with a canny mix of candidates and an inclusive approach that evidently resonated with much of the electorate. It's easy to be cynical about centrist parties, but Yesh Atid is not a collection of political opportunists in search of a new home. Rather it's a group of fresh, diverse talents with plenty of experience in the real world who are now turning their attention to politics. Their lack of parliamentary expertise plainly didn't matter to the voters. If anything, it was an advantage. Look how badly the experienced and egotistical Livni performed, with her assembly of too-familiar faces.

6. Labor's Shelly Yachimovich has strictly limited appeal

The "revitalized" Labor party under social justice champion Shelly Yachimovich fared only two seats better than the tired old Labor party under security expert Ehud Barak four years ago. Many Israelis care a great deal about economic and social inequalities, but they wanted a party inside the coalition to champion them, and she had ruled out a partnership with Netanyahu. Other potential Labor voters felt the lack of compelling policies from Yachimovich on peace and security. The hard-core peaceniks went to Meretz, while Lapid, with ex-Shin Bet chief Yaakov Peri at his side, may well have attracted many of the Yitzhak Rabin-style Labor hawks. Livni took some Labor votes, too. Yachimovich is vowing to lead a "fighting" opposition, but she first has to fight to retain the party leadership. Nobody saw her as a credible prime ministerial alternative to Netanyahu. That's a dismal truth for the longtime party of government.

7. Naftali Bennett can fly higher

So elevated were the expectations in Jewish Home that a final result of 12 seats was seen by some in the party as a disappointment. It's anything but. In barely two months, Bennett lifted a party that won just three seats in 2009 and quadrupled its Knesset strength. Voters seeking change were torn between Bennett and Lapid. Young voters were torn between Bennett and Lapid. Even many secular, not particularly right-wing voters were torn between Bennett and Lapid. Bennett remains a man with a mission – to infuse his stream of Orthodox Judaism into secular Zionism. He isn't done yet.

8. We remain a very divided nation

The weeks of intense coalition-building negotiations we likely now face might be seen as reflecting an unwieldy electoral system that is again putting a dozen parties into a 120-seat parliament. But ours, in turn, is an unwieldy, sectoral public, with its mix of Jews, Arabs, radical righties, radical lefties, the haredi, the fiercely secular and all manner of other folks. Netanyahu's next task is arduous – to put together and maintain a government that can represent the domestic interests of a wide proportion of our divided electorate and steer Israel effectively through the complexities of an unpredictable, threatening region.

Within hours of the polling booths closing, both he and Lapid were articulating a desire for a wide government. Lapid specified that it should be a grouping of "moderate" parties. Now we wait to see what he meant by that vision and whether he and the prime minister, spurred by a fascinating election outcome, can find the common ground to implement it.

Voting with the neighbourhood

Vivn Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

Israelis in the Tel Aviv area patiently await their turn to vote last week.

TEL AVIV — The weather for the 2013 Israeli elections couldn't have been more perfect. It was a beautiful sunny day, and with much of the country off work, there was a relaxed feeling of cheerfulness in the air.

As I walked over to the community centre near my apartment to cast my ballot, the whole neighbourhood seemed to be up and about. Everyone seemed in high spirits. No one was rushing.

Pundits would later explain that the perfect winter day influenced the highest voter turnout in 10 years.

I got to the polling station early, as we had plans to enjoy the national day off with friends. The whole neighbourhood seemed to have similar plans, and I got stuck waiting in line behind a gaggle of neighbours.

And whereas lines in Israel usually don't work, there was no jostling or butting in. Amazingly, everyone waited patiently.

It wasn't until the moment that I stood behind the divider looking at the ballot tickets that I made my decision. Before that, I knew I would vote, but I just didn't know for whom. With a field of 32 contending parties and no single party that represented all my wishes for the country, I fell into the much-talked-about "undecided" category.

And then, with my civil duty done, I gathered up my family and we headed off to the northwest section of Yarkon Park to meet friends. The park was packed.

Israelis across the country took to the outdoors – many going to national parks and the beach, as well as municipal parks to enjoy the extra day off.

Sprawled out on a picnic blanket and sampling lots of cakes and fruit slices, we spoke a bit about politics – we're Israelis, how could we not? – and about the overall feeling of indecisiveness and hope for change.

Fast forward through lunch at a local shwarma stand, everyone coming to play at our place, supper, bath, bedtime for the kids and then the wait for the 10 p.m. newscast. Even though many Israelis – me included – were apprehensive about seeing the results repeat themselves from the last election, we all tuned in to hear the exit polls.

"I wasn't so excited going in to the election. I was quite discouraged, in fact, with all the attention to the right-wing parties and the extremism being touted as moderate. It was scary and really made me not want to pay attention to politics this time around," Ziva Haller Rubenstein, an arts consultant and mother of two in Modi'in, told The CJN.

"So, when the poll results were being announced, I was still not so excited, thinking the predictions would play out and we'd be stuck with the right wing and struggling. After Yesh Atid won 19 seats – and after the right and left blocs were somehow more equalized – I'm definitely more hopeful for the future of this country and for families like mine who want to live peacefully with others, with the environment and with Judaism."

That feeling of hope quickly took over my social media circles, with people Tweeting and posting on Facebook their thoughts on the exit polls.

In Israel, everyone can claim to be a winner, because there are so many parties and no one champion. My peers who supported Likud announced satisfaction with the results. My peers who voted for Yesh Atid were hopeful. My peers who chose Hatnua, Meretz, and Jewish Home also announced victory. So did voters from nearly all the other parties – save for Kadima, which crashed and burned.

"I am happier with the results than I expected to be," said journalist Abigail Leichman, from Ma'ale Adumim, who took a long morning walk outside before hosting her grandchildren for the afternoon. "I think that Likud and Yesh Atid have the potential to bring together disparate factions and to forward a lot of good initiatives for Israel's social, economic and security future – assuming they can form an effective coalition. I do think the results signal a big change. We see traditionally strong vote-getters such as Labor and Shas becoming more marginalized, and we see more native English-speakers stepping up to positions of authority and power. To me, this is a good trend, because North Americans might be able to introduce a saner brand of politics to Israel and also are better equipped to discuss, in English, issues of great national importance with the leaders of governments worldwide."

Copy editor Surie Ackerman, of Jerusalem, said her first thought upon seeing the exit polls was that the government wouldn't be able to hold a coalition together and presumed another round of elections was not far off. She says she's trying to stay hopeful that social issues – and not security – will be the new governments priorities.

"I'm pleased by the presumed shift in emphasis away from defence and security to more domestic issues. I think, however, that a lot of our economic inequality problems stem as much from a lack of solidarity and empathy for each other – reflected as greed at the top of the business pyramid – as from macro-economic problems or decisions. Attitudes like that are much harder to fix," she said.

"Israel proved to itself and to the world that there are significant voices from within that clearly reject the status quo and its bellicose agenda predicated on fear and the threat of military action. The election results hold the promise of a coalition that can lead Israel on a renewed course of engagement with core social issues that continue to fester, while simultaneously addressing Israel's international issues through a multitude of perspectives that will provide a greater system of checks and balances than that which existed under [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu's current term," said Danny Labin, a children's media producer who lives in Tel Aviv.

The new government will include 52 new members of Knesset. There are also 27 female parliamentarians.

"I think what swayed me to vote for Yair Lapid was his centrist but social-focused approach. And that included women's roles in making change in this country," said Haller Rubinstein. "Lapid allowed for women – accomplished and impressive women, too – to take prominent and leadership positions in effecting that change."

"I am very pleased to see that aside from veterans such as Tzipi Livni, Limor Livnat and Shelly Yachimovitch, we have rising stars such as Tzipi Hotovely [Likud] and Ayelet Shaked [Jewish Home]. I will be interested to see how much influence they are able to wield in the 19th Knesset," said Leichman.

With the elections done and coalition talks underway, everyone around me seems to have an opinion about which ministerial position should go to who and whether Likud will form a government with or without the haredi parties.

One thing that is a constant – at least for now – is that feeling of hope.

Stand up for asylum seekers in Israel

Naomi Lightman, A. Daniel Roth and Leora Smith with members of Right Now
Special to The CJN

Many of us gathered in our homes on Dec. 6 to light the menorah in honour of Chanukah. In Tel Aviv's Levinsky Park, a different sort of Chanukah gathering took place.

There, hundreds of Jewish Israelis joined prominent politicians to light the menorah amid picket signs reading, "Sudanese, go back to Sudan." Looking on were non-Jewish African asylum seekers, many of whom are homeless and living in Levinsky Park. While significant segments of Israeli public opinion have turned violently against African asylum seekers, very little has been heard about this in North America. We'd like to start that conversation.

We are a group of young Canadian Jews, taught from childhood that the core values of Judaism include fighting injustice, seeking truth and building peace. Many of us came of age as the Canadian Jewish community took a leading role in the Save Darfur movement.

We planned rallies, started national coalitions and spoke alongside members of Parliament and Holocaust survivors against Sudan's genocidal regime. Canadian Jewish Congress, UJA and many others joined as allies, invoking the legacy of the Shoah and proudly reminding us of Israel's role in sheltering Darfuri refugees.

Today, some Jewish Israelis and members of Knesset (MKs) are mistreating these very refugees. While others, brave Israeli citizens and journalists, have spoken out against their actions, our North American community has remained unacceptably silent. We understand that Israeli society faces numerous domestic challenges, and that there is a hesitancy to be seen as meddling in internal Israeli politics. But, when it comes to the treatment of refugees, a topic so personal to so many of us, we must face this unfortunate reality head on – and we must face it together as a community.

Approximately 60,000 non-Jewish African refugees and asylum seekers live in Israel, and around 85 per cent of them come from Eritrea and Sudan. Most asylum seekers from these countries are not permitted to work, to access health services, or even to apply for refugee status.

The Coalition Against Racism in Israel reported that recorded racist incidents in Israel doubled between 2010 and 2011. Much of this racism has been incited by radical government officials and directed toward non-Jewish Africans.

Eli Yishai, Israel's interior minister, publicly stated that asylum seekers make Tel Aviv a "garbage can." Last May, MK Miri Regev spoke to a large crowd, calling African migrants a "cancer in our body." Following her speech, some in the crowd attacked African people and destroyed and looted African-owned stores. A month earlier, Molotov cocktails were thrown at apartments housing African migrants, including one that housed a daycare.

African asylum seekers repeatedly speak of the dangers they face at home and their desire for a fair process to seek refuge in Israel. Yet, many Israeli officials refuse to hear these refugees, instead branding them "economic migrants." The gross human rights violations perpetrated by the Sudanese and Eritrean governments are internationally known. Canada accepts 96 per cent of Eritrean refugee claimants and 95 per cent of those from Sudan.

Refugees demonstrate their plight at a rally in Tel Aviv in 2012. The sign reads: "We seek sanctuary until the dictatorship in Ethiopia falls." [Israel Sun photo]

Israel is a small country, and there are real challenges to accepting and accommodating refugees. En route, many refugees pass through Egypt, where they are extorted by human smugglers, held for ransom and tortured. Egypt must do better, but Israel also must do its part.

Sweden, with a population comparable to Israel's, has a quota to accept 1,900 refugees each year as citizens. Since 1948, Israel has accepted fewer than 200. Prisons with a capacity for over 10,000 people are being built in the Negev to detain African asylum seekers, and some MKs have publicly stated their intention to "round up" Africans – including children, and genocide survivors – and detain them until they leave.

These are not "fringe" ideas, but actions supported by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu himself.

As a state established by the Jewish People, who profoundly understand what it means to be refugees and to be rejected with the words "none is too many," we must speak out against Israel's unethical actions. We must take a stand against this racism by supporting the various dissenting voices within the media, the political sphere and relief organizations on the ground. Rather than making excuses for the street violence and official mistreatment faced by many African asylum seekers in Israel, we must uphold the core values that bind us together as Jews. Now is the time to say with a united voice that we support an Israel that acts righteously to save lives and provide protection for vulnerable peoples.

Right Now is a coalition of North Americans advocating for asylum seekers in Israel. Learn more by visiting the websites of Israeli organizations Hotline for Migrant Workers and the African Refugee Development Centre. Please consider signing Right Now's petition at http://chn.ge/Tfp3N0

Palestinians threaten lawsuit

The Palestinian Authority has threatened to take Israel to the International Criminal Court (ICC) over plans to build Jewish housing on a controversial land corridor near Jerusalem. PA Foreign Minister Riad Malki said at a United Nations Security Council meeting on the Middle East that the Palestinians would turn to the court if Israel follows through with plans to build 3,000 housing units in the area known as E-1, located between Jerusalem and Ma'aleh Adumim. The Palestinians contend the land is necessary to form their state. Israel announced plans to build on the E-1 land after the Palestinian Authority won upgraded non-member state status in the UN General Assembly. With it, the PA became eligible to apply to join the court. The ICC prosecutes major human rights violations, including charges of genocide and war crimes.

Israeli author Aharon Appelfeld was named to the shortlist for the Mann Booker International Prize for lifetime achievement. Appelfeld, 80, was among 10 authors from around the world who were shortlisted for the fiction prize in 2013. The winner will be announced in May. Appelfeld writes fiction in Hebrew, a language he learned in his teens after escaping a German concentration camp, joining the Soviet army and living in a displaced persons camp in Italy before arriving in pre-state Israel in 1946. Most of his work focuses on Jewish life in Europe before, during and after the war.

Britain criticizes human rights

The British Foreign Office included Israel as "a country of concern" in a report on human rights violators. Israel appeared in a quarterly report on human rights and democracy issued Jan. 24 regarding 28 countries accused of human rights violations. The report cites last year's Gaza war and other recent violence on the border, as well as settlement expansion and Israel's withholding of Palestinian tax revenues. It also criticized the Palestinian Authority for not effectively controlling protests, but said Israel also was culpable for withholding money used to pay Palestinian police. The part of the report dealing with human rights violations in Iran was half as long as the part about Israel.

Social media's advocacy power – and its limits

Michael Snow
Israel Campus Beat

At the height of Israel's Operation Pillar of Defence last November, pro-Israel students on campuses across America felt the need to act, and to act fast.

At the University of Michigan, students from the group I-LEAD, which focuses on leadership, education, advocacy and dialogue, decided to hold a pro-Israel rally.

To attract a substantial turnout in a short time, group leaders took to their social-media accounts. According to Barak Kaufman, the president of I-LEAD, student organizers inundated their networks, including "Facebook, Greek life and academic email list-serves, and any other list-serve we could access."

In just three hours on a Friday afternoon, I-LEAD organizers were able to draw more than 175 students who supported Israel to the rally. The rally was deemed a success and included songs, prayers, candlelighting and a general swell of camaraderie and support. The rally revealed a strong pro-Israel community on a campus traditionally considered antagonistic to the Jewish state.

Word of the impromptu rally's success spread through posts and pictures on social-media sites such as Facebook and Twitter, and the rally was duplicated on other campuses. "Channel 2 News in Israel shared a picture from our event on their Facebook page," Kaufman said. "The photo got literally thousands of likes and comments from Israelis. It was extremely moving."

Reflecting on the event's success, Kaufman said, "Without social media, none of it would have been possible."

This kind of activism unites people with a shared cause, allowing community members to feel connected or empowered to take action, said Erin Fox, assistant director of new media for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). "Through social media we are able to build and engage with our community in a way that was never possible before."

As more people get news and information through sites such as Twitter and Facebook, Israel activists must update their advocacy techniques for the nascent digital age. It does not take an advanced marketing degree to recognize that social media is a platform Israel activists cannot afford to ignore.

While students at the University of Michigan used social media to promote a real-life event, sites such as Twitter and Facebook have become arenas of Israel advocacy unto themselves. According to Aaron Marcus, the Northeast campus co-ordinator for the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA), Twitter and Facebook are crucial fronts in a holistic campaign on Israel's behalf. "When I talk on campuses, one of the things I always say is Israel is engaged in two wars – a physical one, against enemies who seek its material destruction and a war of public relations," Marcus said.

Increasingly, this public relations war is waged through Tweets, Facebook statuses and memes. Student activists are indispensable soldiers in the war against those seeking to delegitimize Israel. "American students live on social-media platforms; it is where they communicate with friends, share ideas, promote issues and organically create an image or brand of themselves," Seth Kroll, the video and new media co-ordinator for the David Project, shared.

How does social-media advocacy compare to its real-world counterpart? Can a post on a site such as Facebook, Twitter, Tumblr or Google+ have the same impact as a speaker on campus or tabling with materials in university student centres?

Sometimes virtual messages communicated through social media have the potential to reach countless more people than any real-life program or speaker. David Bernstein, the executive director of the David Project, said that a video produced at an advocacy seminar for college students got 15,000 views in its first week. "If you think about that," he said, "there's no program that you can do on any college campus that would get 15,000 people. It would have to be held in the basketball arena to fit them. You're able to get to more students through this type of media than you ever could in any traditional setting."

Students held a pro-Israel rally at the University of Michigan during Israel's Operation Pillar of Defence.

Marcus similarly shared: "ZOA makes sure that facts about Israel are out there and accessible to anyone with a computer, iPad or smartphone. This way, we are able to instantly put that information right into people's hands."

College Israel activists in particular used social media to spread pro-Israel messages and reports during and after Operation Pillar of Defence. One popular trend involved Facebook users changing their profile pictures to a red square, a nod to the "red alert" siren that indicates incoming rocket fire from Gaza. In places like Sderot, the siren gives Israeli civilians approximately 15 seconds to find shelter.

For those in the know, switching a profile picture to the red square can be a meaningful gesture, symbolizing allegiance and sympathy with Israelis in danger. But Marcus cautioned against overestimating the impact of social media. It is tempting and self-congratulatory to think that retweeting a message from Israeli ambassador the United States, Michael Oren, or changing your profile picture to a red square, will change the opinions of your friends or followers. "Changing your profile picture to a red square isn't going to do anything to refute claims of apartheid," he said.

While advocacy through social media is decidedly convenient and accessible, some deride it as "slacktivism" and armchair advocacy. Social-media messages often entail a cyclical "preaching to the choir" effect when Facebook and Twitter posts are "liked" or retweeted by those who already agree with such messages. Facebook is even organized to show you postings by the profiles and accounts you most often visit. Thus, social media does not necessarily reach those important sectors of the campus community who don't already support Israel.

Although this may be one downside to social media, Talia Rotman, Israel engagement co-ordinator for Hillel of Greater Toronto, said it can lead to conversations and thus awareness of issues. For example, while making your Facebook profile picture a solid red square to represent solidarity with Israel wouldn't mean anything to someone who wasn't aware of the campaign, they might ask what the picture meant, and that could spark a discussion.

Additionally, she said, social media has been particularly valuable for maintaining communication among Israeli engagement interns at the various universities and colleges in Toronto, thus ensuring they are sending strong, consistent messages.

Effective Israel advocacy on campus in 2013 and beyond must embrace the potential of social media, but Facebook statuses will not do the work by themselves. To be most effective, Israel advocacy must be a fluid process, taking shape through both personal and virtual connections and campaigns, to develop within the community strong support for Israel.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

CINEPLEX DECISION LEAVES ISRAELI FILM FESTIVALS SCRAMBLING FOR NEW HOMES

The Israeli film festivals in both Montreal and Toronto are seeking new permanent homes after Cineplex Entertainment advised them they could no longer use the theatres in both cities where they have been for eight and five years respectively.

Although the Montreal festival has already found a new venue – in Cinema Guzzo instead of the AMC Forum where it had been previously – the organizer of the Montreal fest suggested Cineplex's decision may spell curtains for the festivals.

"Since Cineplex owns so many cinemas in both Montreal and Toronto, their decision could mean that the festival in both cities is over," said Marie Pregent. "It isn't easy to find a place with a high-quality screen that is well located. It's almost impossible to find a place that we can afford."

While the Montreal fest runs in April, the Toronto fest is in October, so organizers in Toronto still have considerable time to find a new venue as a replacement for its previous location in the Sheppard Grande Cinema at Yonge Street and Sheppard Avenue.

Both festivals were founded by Tel Aviv businessman Eran Bester, who described Cineplex's emailed notification to him as "shocking and very disappointing." The company explained it had done an assessment of its "long-term relationships with certain film festivals" and determined not to renew the arrangement with the Israeli Film Festival. Cineplex declined to provide any further details to festival organizers.

In an email exchange with The CJN, Cineplex spokesperson Mike Langdon said the company's decision not to renew the annual arrangement was "a business decision and a result of challenges working with the organizer."

While Langdon would not divulge if arrangements with any other film festival had also been terminated, he said Cineplex "is a proud supporter of many Jewish and Israeli festivals and charities, including the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, Jewish Windsor Film Festival, Walk with Israel, the Canadian Friends of Israel Museum and the Simon Wiesenthal Center."

He also noted that Ellis Jacob, the company's president and CEO, co-chaired the 2012 Jewish National Fund Negev Gala dinner in Toronto, which helped to raise $5.1 million for a botanical garden in Akko, Israel.

The festivals in both cities paid the standard market rates for the theatres, Pregent said, adding that she and Bester remained mystified by Cineplex's decision.

"In Toronto we had six sold-out screenings in the 400-seat auditorium. That makes quite a lot of people eating popcorn. And in Montreal, when we get 3,000 people in a week, they're also eating popcorn and candy and they're parking downstairs. My perception is that I would be very happy to have those extra people in my cinema. I can't see how that's bad for business."

Gabi Epstein to play Tzitel in Fiddler on the Roof

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Toronto actor Gabi Epstein will be performing the role of Tzitel in Fiddler on the Roof at Stage West Theatre Restaurant from Feb. 14 to April 21.

Although Epstein sang songs from Fiddler in Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's To Life, for which she received a Dora Award nomination, it is the first time she has been in the musical based on Sholem Aleichem stories.

"Tzitel is the eldest daughter of Tevye and Golda's five daughters," says Epstein. "The whole show talks about tradition and going with the times and moving on with new traditions. [Tzitel] is the first one in the family to break tradition by not having a match arranged for her by a matchmaker, but actually marrying for love. Tzitel breaks down the barrier for the rest of the family."

This is Epstein's debut at Stage West but she's no stranger to the theatre having been catching shows there for years. "It is this classic dinner theatre, so you get a really unique theatre experience," she says. "There aren't many dinner theatres around at all in Canada."

She thinks the reason why Fiddler has remained such an important show for so many years is that although it uses

Judaism and the culture of Judaism, the issues are heart and home issues families in all cultures deal with.

Epstein hopes audiences leave Stage West humming the tunes from Jerry Bock and Sheldon Harnick's score, including crowd favourites such as If I Were a Rich Man, Sunrise, Sunset, Matchmaker and Tradition.

"There really aren't that many musicals where you walk away humming the tunes. What I love about the show is the music it is so beautiful," she says.

How Judaism shaped Steven Spielberg's films

Robert Gluck
JNS.org

Steven Spielberg's films, including his latest, Lincoln, continue to reflect his Jewish upbringing.

According to Lester Friedman, author of The Jewish Image in American Film, American Jewish Filmmakers and Citizen Spielberg, there is more to Spielberg than meets the eye.

"It's indisputable he's the most successful filmmaker in American history, but he's much more than that," Friedman said. "His Jewish background is omnipresent. It cuts both ways."

Friedman explained that Spielberg's parents "lived in predominantly Christian areas" and that Spielberg "was the subject of antisemitism, everything from swastikas on the windows to rolling a penny down the aisle in class and students saying 'go get it Jew-boy.'

"He was concerned about hiding his Judaism," Friedman said. "His early films stayed far away from it. He doesn't confront it until An American Tail, where [the main character] Fievel is the name of his grandfather. He confronts it in the most crucial and important way in two films, Schindler's List, in which he makes the archetypal Holocaust film, and 12 years later with Munich."

In 1994, inspired by his experience making Schindler's List, Spielberg established the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation to gather video testimonies from survivors and other witnesses of the Holocaust. While most of those who gave testimony were Jews, the foundation also interviewed homosexual survivors, Jehovah's Witness survivors, liberators and liberation witnesses, political prisoners, rescuers and aid providers, Gypsy survivors and others.

Nigel Morris, the author of The Cinema of Steven Spielberg, said that some critics "carelessly dismiss him as a children's director or maker of escapist fantasies.

"They resent his enormous success, mistakenly focus on what they label as manipulation or sentimentality, or confuse him with George Lucas and naively blame either director or both for the blockbuster tendency that destroyed the freedom and creativity of early 1970s Hollywood, as if that were not an economic inevitability," Morris said.

Spielberg has his finger on the heartbeat of a historic dilemma.

Morris agrees with Friedman that Spielberg had little desire to embrace his Jewish ethnic identity or faith until he was profoundly affected by making Schindler's List while in his late 40s.

"The characteristic 'God light,' as the director has called it, [which] is central to both Spielberg's visual style and the deeper meaning of his work… flows from his earliest memory of being pushed in a stroller through a Cincinnati synagogue aged just six months. The candles and dazzling reflections in candelabra became entwined with the awe of larger-than-life figures when he first saw a movie in a theatre, creating the quasi-religious wonder that is repeatedly associated with spectacle, and particularly film, through all his output."

Morris said Spielberg, as a child, was displaced to various strange new locations across the United States as his father changed jobs, suffering bullying and antisemitism. One of Spielberg's coping strategies was to seek popularity by casting his oppressors in the movies he made outside school hours.

"Spielberg was quoted as saying that being 'Jewish and wimpy made me part of a major minority,'" Morris said. "This helped the fledgling director empathize with the civil rights cause and arguably led to his much later adoption of two African-American children, as well as the interest in black culture manifested seriously and respectfully in several of his films.

"Spielberg partly established the context, and tone, for many of the attacks that were made as much against him as the film," said Morris. "When he imperiously declared, 'If it takes my name to get people to see Schindler's List, so be it,' he suggested the project might not have been viable without him and implied higher aspirations than 'mere' entertainment. Certainly, a black-and-white film, over three hours long and without major stars, seemed unlikely to appeal to youthful blockbuster audiences, 60 per cent of whom were unaware of the Holocaust." According to Morris, Schindler's redemption paralleled Spielberg's transformation from shallow crowd-pleaser to serious Jewish artist.

"Promotion and interviews stressed his return to ethnic roots and newfound faith," Morris said. "Spielberg repeatedly spoke of his own antisemitic experiences, thereby identifying himself, descended from German Jews, with Holocaust victims. Equating seriousness, solemnity and quality, industry names finally recognized Spielberg, bestowing Academy Awards at the exact time that media coverage was distancing him from Hollywood entertainment values."

With Lincoln, Hollywood has another popular film, but Spielberg has more. He has his finger on the heartbeat of a historic American dilemma – with applications to modern times – by dealing with president Abraham Lincoln's moral question of whether to prolong the Civil War to get an important amendment passed.

Perhaps columnist Clarence Page best answered Spielberg's (and Lincoln's) question in the Chicago Tribune when he wrote, "Democratic governance of a large, diverse republic requires compromises. You can't always get what you want, but we can work together across partisan lines to get what we need."

Leading cabaret performer

"My favourite part about being Jewish is the traditions that I continue to celebrate with my family, and so I just hope that people walk away feeling pride in their family and feeling a sense of their community around them, and that they are proud of the traditions they have and know that change is possible, and open their eyes to it."

In addition to To Life, Epstein has performed in The Sound of Music, Perfect Wedding, Blood Brothers, Dani Girl, I Love You Because, Edge and Toy Story the Musical.

She's been making a mark for herself as one of Toronto's leading cabaret performers and recently made her New York City cabaret debut at the legendary Don't Tell Mama, in her one-woman show A Gabaret, Cabar'EH, Tales of a Canadian in New York, which the Times Square Chronicles named the top cabaret of 2012.

Epstein, who teaches singing when not performing, has also released a CD, Show Off, which is available on iTunes and her website, www.gabiepstein.com.

Epstein is the daughter of author Kathy Kacer, and her brother, Jake, is also an actor, currently starring in Spiderman on Broadway.

Stage West's Fiddler is performed by an all-Canadian cast, with George Masswohl as Tevye. The show is directed and choreographed by Max Reimer, and the musical director is Anthony Bastianon.

Eastern Europe's lost years

[Reviewed by Norman Ravvin]

In the immediate aftermath of World War II, the myriad of challenges dealt with by occupying forces in Poland included the flow of Jewish refugees from one side of the occupied zone to the other. In the spring of 1947, the U.S. Army European Command closed its zone to any further displaced persons.

Jannet Flanner, reporting in the New Yorker in June of that year, allowed that since Jews "were the only national group still flowing into our DP [displaced persons] camps in large number, they were the most affected."

Key political and cultural developments after the war are the focus of Anne Applebaum's Iron Curtain: The Crushing of Eastern Europe 1944-1956 (Signal).

Scenarios like that of postwar refugees, the effort on the part of Jews to resettle in Eastern Europe and, ultimately, the rise of authoritarian communism are little understood in the West. Events associated with the wartime simply obliterate them, making Applebaum's depiction of a troubling decade all the more satisfying.

Applebaum opens with a portrait of the ethnic transfers that took place with the realigning of Poland's borders, motivated both by Stalin's wishes in the East and the urge on the part of the victors to incorporate western lands into the revived Polish state. In conquered Germany, the devastation of war had, under Soviet occupation, the added impact of mass rape and pillage enacted on civilians by the Red Army.

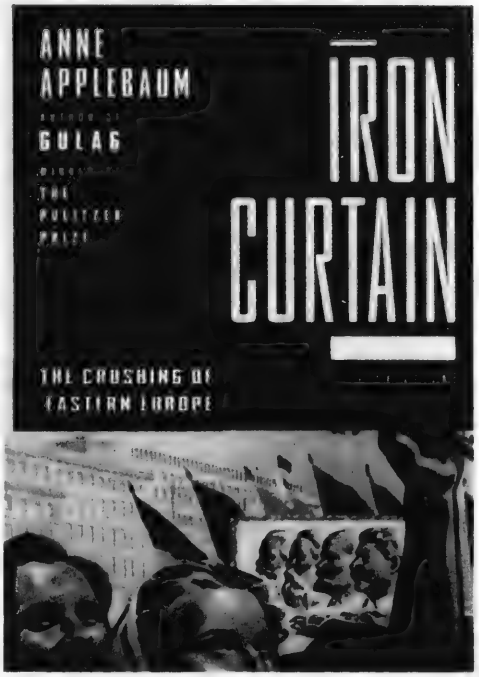
Applebaum writes movingly of the spontaneous reappearance of free civil society in Poland and Hungary. Youth volunteered en masse to aid in the massive rebuilding project required by the destruction of Warsaw. Women's organizations initiated welfare programs, while in Warsaw both the YMCA and Catholic charities undertook to recreate a stable social life. Polska YMCA organized "parties, concerts, camps, clubs, sports, and discussion groups of a kind that could be found nowhere else."

With the increasing involvement of Soviet government representatives and police organizations in Eastern Bloc redevelopment, such undertakings were gradually suppressed. At the same time, Soviet interference in elections, support for Communist parties and increasing repression of dissent limited the range of organizations available to postwar citizens. The Catholic Church came in for special minding, with its organizational power newly viewed as a threat to the nascent Communist social order. In Poland, Cardinal Stefan Wyszyski took a moderate approach to this oppression, while in Hungary, Cardinal József Mindszenty's outspoken criticism of the increasing centralization of power in the hands of Communists led to his arrest, torture and imprisonment.

Daily life fell prey to the all-too-prevalent surveillance of secret police and informers, while Marxist-Leninist economic policies made it increasingly impossible to survive as a small businessman or tradesperson.

In the aftermath of the events of the Holocaust, these developments had specific meaning for Eastern Europe's drastically damaged Jewish communities. As many as 70,000 Jews left Poland for Palestine in the first few years following the end of the war. The bulk of emigrating Jews were anti-Communist, while "a disproportionate number" who stayed either had "high expectations of a Communist regime" or had "jobs in the Communist state apparatus."

Applebaum dispenses with what she calls the "mythology" of substantial Jewish involvement in either the state or security apparatus in Poland. It is true, however, that a number of prominent leaders in Hungary's Communist regime were Jews, a development that regimes throughout the East viewed as an impediment to gaining wider popularity among the mainstream population.



In the period called "High Stalinism," which ended with the leader's death in March 1953, common reasons for arrest tended to follow "Stalin's own obsessions of the time." One might be dubbed a "right-deviationist," a "Titoist," a "cosmopolitan" or "Zionist."

Jews, Applebaum tells us, had "come to the forefront of Stalinist paranoia following the establishment of the State of Israel," leading to a broad attack on Soviet Jews, as well as those in Soviet client states. With Stalin, his underlings in Poland, Hungary and East Germany believed that the persecution of Jewish Communists – scapegoating Soviet style – would "be welcomed by everyone else."

Applebaum draws an intriguing portrait of the early efforts by Eastern Europeans to buck the weight of Soviet power, including short-lived street marches in 1953 East Berlin, and a groundswell of independent-mindedness, which followed an ill-considered Warsaw Youth Festival in 1955. With the influx of leftist representatives and delegates from western Europe, postwar Poles got their first look at how free westerners dressed, talked and acted. The shock of recognition is remembered by Maciej Rosalak, who was a child at the time: "Grey, sad, poorly dressed people living among ruins and the rubble of streets were suddenly replaced by what seemed to be a different species. The newcomers smiled instead of listening to the static on Radio Free Europe like our parents, and they sang instead of whispering. Warsaw children ran among them and collected autographs in special notebooks."

Such notebooks may now reside in the backs of drawers or in shoeboxes, artifacts of a faraway, almost forgotten time. Applebaum's Iron Curtain offers readers a glimpse of life "among ruins," and an understanding of what became of Eastern Europe under the Russians.

Norman Ravvin's recent books include the novel, The Joyful Child, and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein, co-edited with Sherry Simon. He is at work on a novel set partly in Poland.

Levine to join Canadian Davis Cup team

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — It's the dream of every professional tennis player to play for his nation's Davis Cup national team, and Ottawa-born Jesse Levine has taken bold steps to make this dream come true.

Levine, who has lived in Boca Raton, Fla., since age 13 and played tennis as an American through last November, applied in December to the International Tennis Federation to be allowed to play for the Canadian Davis Cup team.

Under International Tennis Federation rules, Levine will have to wait 90 days for his application to be accepted, so he won't be eligible to play the Davis Cup tie versus Spain from Feb. 1 to 3 in Vancouver. However, he will practise with the Canadian Davis Cup team.

"I am excited to play for my home country Canada, even if I can't play in February," said the 25-year-old Levine on a phone conference call with reporters from the Auckland, N.Z., tournament that he is playing. Levine is Canada's second-highest-ranked singles player (at No. 104) and will play for Canada at its tie in April.

Jesse Levine

"We are pleased that Jesse will play for Canada," said Tennis Canada president Michael Downey. "Jesse will strengthen our Davis Cup team as our second-ranked singles player. Being a lefty and having the experience of playing tough against top players adds depth to our roster."

"This is a wonderful opportunity not only because I want so much to play Davis Cup, but now I may have an opportunity of being in the Olympics as well. I am at heart a Canadian. I love the Ottawa Senators hockey team, I know the other Canadians since I played them in the junior level and everything feels right," added Levine.

He was also elated to learn that he would become the first Jewish player to play on the Canadian Davis Cup team since Derek Segal, also from Ottawa, did it in 1988. With Toronto native Sharon Fichman likely to play in the 2013 Fed Cup, the two are set to become the first Jewish man and woman to play Davis and Fed Cups in the same year since Mike Belkin (Montreal) and Vicky Berner (Vancouver) did it in 1968.

"It means a lot to be the first Jewish player on Davis Cup for Canada in so many years. I went to a Hebrew day school in Ottawa, feel proudly Jewish and look forward to play soon," Levine said.

Since turning pro in 2007, Levine has been invited several times by Canadian Davis Cup coach Martin Laurendeau to join the team, but he had declined until last December, feeling loyal to the United States Tennis Association (USTA), which funded his coaching and training since he moved to Florida in 2000.

"The USTA has given me so many opportunities with wild cards into tournaments [and] practising with the Davis Cup team that I felt for so long that my prospects should remain with the U.S.A. But I wanted to play Davis Cup and so it made sense to play for Canada," he said.

As a youth, Levine took tennis lessons at the Ottawa Athletic Club and attended school at Hillel Academy. He was all set to improve his tennis locally. But the family doctor found that Jesse's younger brother, Daniel, had colitis, so a few weeks following Jesse's bar mitzvah at Agudath Israel Congregation in Ottawa, the family moved to Boca Raton.

Because Levine's father is American, Levine had the option of joining either the American or Canadian Davis Cup teams. Ironically, the move to Florida turned out to be a blessing for Jesse as well. Levine continued to hone his tennis game by going to the Chris Evert Tennis Academy and later to the Nick Bollettieri Tennis Academy.

Living in a city with a year-round climate ideally suited for a tennis pro, Levine has blossomed as a well-rounded player. Winning a scholarship at University of Florida, Levine won 24 matches as a freshman in 2007 before turning pro. However, the odds of Levine earning a berth on the American Davis Cup have always been slim. Even with the retirement of Andy Roddick last November, there are currently six Americans ranked ahead of him for only two singles players to join doubles team Bob and Mike Bryan on the four-player U.S. Davis Cup team.

By contrast, Canadian coach Laurendeau prefers to have three singles players on his Davis Cup team to join doubles specialist Daniel Nestor. Levine would then be assured of a berth on the Canadian Davis Cup team in April, even if his ranking falls below that of current third-ranked Canadian Vasek Pospisil, ranked No. 125 by the ATP.

Levine's fortunes continue to rise. After finishing in the quarter-finals at the Auckland tournament, he is currently ranked among the top 100 in the world.

Italian teams honour Jewish coach

JTA

MILAN — Italian soccer players expressed their opposition to racism by honouring a Jewish coach who was killed in the Holocaust.

At an Italian Cup quarter-finals match in Milan recently, team members of the Milan Inter team and Bologna donned T-shirts bearing the slogan "No to Racism" and the portrait of Arpad Weisz, a Hungarian Jew who coached both teams in the 1930s. Weisz was deported and killed in Auschwitz in 1944.

Officials, including the mayors of Milan and Bologna, Jewish community representatives and the Hungarian consul, attended a ceremony before the match at which the teams exchanged jerseys bearing Weisz's name and the number 18.

A plaque honouring Weisz was dedicated at Milan's stadium one year ago.

Globetrotter now helps disabled Canadians online

Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

Jeffrey Bernstein has helped communities around the globe – the 27-year-old political science grad has been everywhere from Uruguay to South Sudan and Israel. Now he's ready to bring his skills to help his own community in Canada.

Bernstein is the co-founder of synapsABILITY, an organization that hopes to provide a digital space for Canadians with disabilities and their families. "We're trying to build an online social platform for the support networks that care for people with developmental and physical disabilities in Canada," he said.

The project is a very personal one for Bernstein, whose autistic brother, Alan, was the inspiration behind the organization. "He's an incredible guy… He does a lot in the community. He's very, very, very involved with the Jewish community, and he's sort of found a home for himself over the years there, in various synagogues and organizations."

The idea behind synapsABILITY, which is still in its early stages, is to provide a new tool for people with disabilities and their networks (families, friends, social workers, educators, doctors, employers, etc.) that allows them to connect with each other and learn from their experiences.

"The population in Canada with disabilities and the people who support them is a big, growing and powerful network that hasn't necessarily found its voice in the way that many advocates would like it to," the Toronto native said. "But this is something that we're hoping to eventually change.

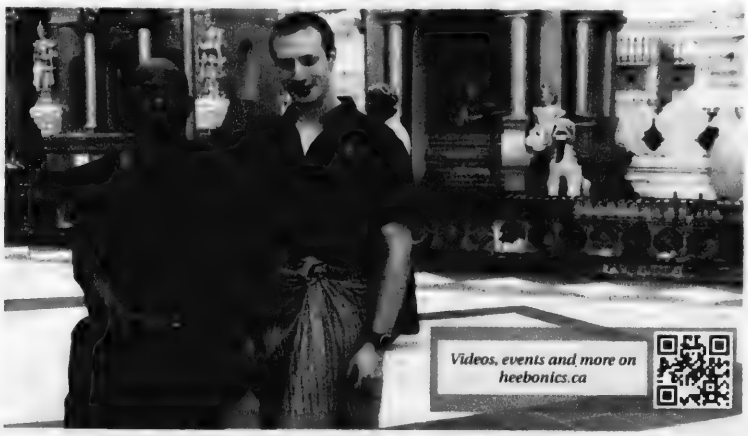
"I've been trying to find a way back to my community in a sense," Bernstein added, "and find something that I could connect with here, locally. Something that would be meaningful work and hits close to home."

He said a lot of people ask him why he's become a social entrepreneur when his background is in politics and public affairs. But according to Bernstein, the two career paths aren't so far apart: both allow him to work with social justice, which is something he's always been passionate about.

Bernstein has been volunteering since he was a kid. He was heavily involved with the Jewish youth groups Kadima and United Synagogue Youth, where he was able to get a first taste of helping out people in need. "The social action component was kind of that big driver," he said.

He enrolled at the University of Toronto for his undergraduate degree and chose to spend his third year studying at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Bernstein focused on Middle Eastern politics during his time there and said it was his first introduction to independent research.

"That was definitely one of my defining moments for growth, I'd say. Obviously, living in a different country, as familiar as Israel might be to Jews, it's still very different," he said. "But going as a 20-year-old, there's a lot that you sort of absorb and learn."



As part of his work, Jeffrey Bernstein travelled to Myanmar to look for counterfeit medicine. He is seen here with a monk who was studying at the Shwedagon Pagoda, a famous Buddhist temple.

He said he came back to Toronto with a newfound energy. After wrapping up his undergrad degree at U of T, Bernstein worked at a think-tank in Washington, D.C., for six months and volunteered with the Barack Obama campaign.

"Just being in D.C. as a political scientist – it's the Mecca of this universe for anyone who wants to study that, who wants to work in international policy, international affairs," he said. "It was amazing. I was very lucky to have that break."

While he waited to hear back from master's programs, Bernstein did some travelling. He returned to Israel and stayed there for three months, but this time he volunteered at an organization called Peace Players International. He described it as a project that uses "basketball as a model for bridging the divides between… parties in conflict."

Bernstein added that he got to see a different side of the country that he didn't get to see while on his Birthright trip or even during his year abroad at Hebrew U.

He returned from his trip and started pursuing his master's degree at the Norman Paterson School of International Affairs at Carleton University in Ottawa. During that time, he also landed a job working as a human rights adviser to Canadian Senator Roméo Dallaire. There, he was responsible for managing the senator's international relationships and doing things like writing speeches and op-eds.

It's safe to say Bernstein has done some exciting things over the last few years. But one of his most thrilling experiences happened just a few months ago when he landed a gig at a startup organization that does consultancy work in international policy and research. It might not sound like an interesting job, but it's the one that led him on a hunt for counterfeit medicine in South Sudan and Myanmar.

"My boss had spent a lot of time in [unusual] places," he said, citing Somalia, Yemen and Nigeria as examples.

"He would always notice that in market places there would be medicine that either looked suspicious or was unlabelled, or it was sort of lumped in."

Over the summer, Bernstein spent a month in South Sudan and a month in Myanmar investigating counterfeit medicine issues. He said being in South Sudan was an eye-opening experience. "I've travelled a lot, I've been to a lot of places… But [South Sudan is] unlike any country I've ever seen or you could imagine. It's almost like being in the beginning of time, in a sense. There's only a few kilometres of paved roads there. There's very, very little infrastructure. Brick and mortar buildings… there's a few, but it's not sort of the norm."

All of his experiences have helped him become a social entrepreneur. Bernstein said any young person can launch a company nowadays. It's about having an idea and surrounding yourself with motivated people.

You don't have to drop everything you're doing in order to have an entrepreneurial experience, he added. Sometimes it's just a matter of learning or volunteering in an area you're passionate about. He said that young generations are now shaping many fields, including marketing, technology and advertising.

"There's incredible change that's happening in that world, being driven by people who are not any older than us," he said. "In fact, many are much younger."

It may be you, not your boss

Dear Ella,

I've been working in the same company for almost five years. I like my job and the people I work with. I hate my boss, and I think he hates me. He doesn't treat me like he treats the other employees in my department, and there's blatant favouritism, which makes for a very uncomfortable environment.

For example, he never says good morning to me, and a smile is out of the question. I get chastised if I'm even one minute late, yet I've seen others come in late and he doesn't say a word. He never chit-chats with me like he does with my colleagues. Sometimes I feel like a leper in this place. The other employees are very cordial and nice to me, and we all get along great until "he" walks into the room. Then everyone starts sucking up to him, and it feeds his ego.

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

I feel it's unfair, but this is a secure, paying job and I have a lot of bills to pay. I don't have the luxury of leaving just because of a personality conflict. I don't know if it's a sexist thing or a jealousy thing. I don't really want to complain about him to the head of the company, because that will just make things worse.

What should I do?

Hate My Boss

Dear Hate My Boss,

Since you spend most of your day at work, contentment in the workplace is important. Usually a problem with a boss is much more than just a personality conflict.

Perhaps you need to look at the bigger picture – look at yourself. Does your performance match your colleagues and, therefore, allow for you to have the extra perks? Do you work as diligently, ethically and efficiently as other employees? Are you clear, open, reliable and trustworthy? Does your self-interest trump your concern for others? Are you respectful, or do you roll your eyes or sigh when you are not happy?

Don't just gloss over these questions. You'd best think about them long and hard, and be very honest with yourself if you really want to find a solution.

Even if you honestly don't feel like you're guilty of any of these, others' perceptions may be different than your own.

Of course, it's possible that it's as simple as your boss just doesn't like you, but that's unlikely to happen for no reason, and I assume he had something to do with hiring you?

If you want to improve your situation, you'll need to change your attitude first. Make up your mind to give it all you've got and be the best you can be. Walk in on time, or even a little early, with a smile on your face. Look your boss in the eye and say good morning first. Work harder and smarter. Anticipate what he and your team need and stay on top of it. Don't kvetch and complain. Be proactive and put the good of the company before your own gain.

If you truly give it all you've got and still have a problem with your boss, you have nothing to lose by requesting a private meeting and confronting him. Maybe there is something you're missing, but prepare yourself to hear things you may not be aware of, or may not like.

Most problems can be fixed with hard work and honesty. Good luck.

HONEY MUSTARD, BROCCOLI & APPLE SALAD

Salad

- 2 bunches broccoli w/ stems
- 1/2 c roasted, salted shelled sunflower seeds
- 1 Fuji apple, cored, sliced thin
- 1/4 c arugula leaves

Dressing

- 3 tbls whole grain mustard
- 2 tbls honey
- 2 tbls olive oil
- 2 tbls vinegar (any kind)
- Salt, pepper to taste

Cut florets off broccoli; thinly slice stems. Microwave or steam florets/stems a couple of minutes until hard raw crunch is cooked from broccoli. Rinse with cold water. Set aside.
In large bowl, combine mustard, honey, olive oil, vinegar, few pinches of salt and pepper. Whisk vigorously until thoroughly combined. Add broccoli, sunflower seeds, sliced apple, and arugula to bowl. Toss until well coated. Chill about 30 min. Serve cold. Best served the day it is made.

The art of listening, again and again

It was a replay of a common interaction. I was telling my daughter a story from my past and she responded with, "I know, I know, you've told me that before."

I realized what a common occurrence this sort of interaction is and explained to her, "Even if you have heard the story before, remember that it's important to listen again because I may not remember that I told the story before and the telling of the story may have as much significance for me as it might have for you."

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

I then realized how often in my geriatric practice one of the complaints by families is how often their loved one tells them the same thing over and over. They use that symptom as evidence of cognitive decline – the inability to recall what was said previously. This symptom, although common and often indicative of cognitive functional decline, is also a manifestation of the common human propensity to focus on the narrative of one's life and to recount it as part of one's process of self-identity and validation. But, what is the separation between the normal attribute of recounting the narrative of one's life and the pathology of cognitive impairment that fails to recognize the recent repetition of that story to a loved one?

The telling of stories is important. In normal relationships and conversations, we spend much effort recounting life events to others. The propensity to be repetitive is universal, as anyone in a long-standing relationship will admit. If the topics of conversation between spouses are tracked over time, we would probably find the same topics repeated in one form or another, topics related to work, interpersonal conflicts and important decisions, and about significant family members. A prohibition on the repetition of topics to be discussed would likely result in little communication.

For instance, any member of a couple usually knows the political views of the other partner. When the topic comes up in a social setting, they often patiently listen to their partner express their views to presumably a new audience (although this is not always the case) with rare rude interruptions such as: "We have heard your views before. If you do not have a new one, just stop talking."

The challenge for those facing the extremes of repetition in a loved one who is experiencing cognitive impairment is what to do. Family members usually learn to avoid interrupting the recounting of an event with: "You told me already" or "I know," as this may cause conflict with a denial that the conversation has taken place.

In the context of normal aging, family members may find that the retelling of one's life narrative frequently occurs. This is one way we validate our lives, which is important as the past becomes increasingly important compared to the limited options for the future. This human need to tell our narratives is reflected in the interest by many in writing autobiographies and memoirs and in reading them. Being patient with our narrative-telling loved ones is important to them and ultimately to us.

The best recommendation I can make about this inevitable process is to find ways to be patient with your loved one and accept that even though you have heard the story before, acknowledging it and expressing an interest in it is helpful and even therapeutic to both of you.

Netanyahu asked to form government

Israel's water worries are over

JERUSALEM — After years of constantly being urged to conserve water, Israel's National Water Authority announced Jan. 29 that Israelis no longer need to fear droughts and that the country's water worries are essentially over.

The solution for the longstanding problem comes not from the clouds, which have provided generous amounts of rainfall this winter, but primarily from desalination technology that can transform seawater into something you can drink.

"Already we are desalinating 25 per cent of our consumable water with the aid of three active plants. And with two more in the works, we will increase that amount to 50 per cent. The drought that has plagued us in recent years is definitely over," said Avner Hermoni, CEO of Derech Hayam desalination.

"Sea of Galilee water levels are no longer an issue," added Danny Sofer, a regional director for the national Mekorot water company. He said that water from the northern lake now makes up only 10 per cent of Israel's sources.

Hebrew U Asteroid

MONTREAL — An asteroid co-discovered nine years ago by three amateur astronomers – a Jewish ex-Montrealer named David E. Levy and his wife, Wendee, who now live in Arizona, as well as Torontonian Tom Glinos – has been named in honour of Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Levy had wanted to name an asteroid after the school since completing a PhD in English there in 2010. His thesis explored the link between the night sky and the works of Shakespeare and other early modern writers. The International Astronomical Union rejected the name Hebrewuniversity as too long, but accepted Hebrewu this past fall. Formerly called Asteroid 271,763, it's located in the asteroid belt between Mars and Jupiter.

WORLD

Yom Kippur Vote

SYDNEY, Australia — Australia scheduled its national elections for Yom Kippur. Prime Minister Julia Gillard announced the Sept. 14 date last week. With the Yom Kippur date, more Australian Jews are expected to vote by mail or at pre-poll booths, as Sabbath observers do now because Australian elections are held on Saturdays. Voting is mandatory in Australia. Those who don't vote are fined. Joshua Frydenberg, the only Jewish lawmaker for the opposition Liberal Party, said he was disappointed, but Peter Wertheim, head of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, said, "It is not a major issue for us." Federal elections have not clashed with Yom Kippur since the Australian Electoral Commission began logging election dates, Fairfax Media reported. Australia has a Jewish population of 110,000.

Toulouse Arrests

PARIS — French police arrested two men in connection with an attack last year on a Jewish school in Toulouse. The men, 28 and 30, were arrested Jan. 29 in Toulouse and taken to Paris for questioning, the news agency AFP reported. They reportedly were friends of Mohammed Merah, who killed three Jewish children and a rabbi at the Ozar Hatorah school in Toulouse last March 19. Merah was killed three days later in a police raid on his home. Before attacking the school, he killed three French soldiers. The arrested men had been placed under surveillance about two weeks ago. They could be held for up to four days without being charged under France's anti-terrorism laws.

Former Liberal Candidate Settles Lawsuit

WINNIPEG — Former federal Liberal candidate Lesley Hughes has settled a defamation lawsuit against Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, federal cabinet minister Peter Kent and four officials of the Jewish groups.

Lesley Hughes

The freelance journalist and broadcaster filed the suit in 2009, alleging that the defendants accused her of being antisemitic for an article she wrote about the 9/11 attacks. It examined claims Israeli businesses in New York City's World Trade Center vacated the facility a week before the attack and that German intelligence warned their U.S., Israeli and Russian counterparts of the looming operation.

When Hughes ran as a Liberal candidate in the 2008 election in Winnipeg's Kildonan-St. Paul, the article surfaced. She was accused of antisemitism and then-Liberal leader Stéphane Dion revoked her candidacy.

Hughes issued a joint statement Dec. 1 with Kent and the two Jewish groups.

"Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, and Peter Kent accept that Ms. Hughes does not condone the use of antisemitic conspiracy theories by racist groups to support antisemitism of any nature," it said. "They therefore acknowledge and agree that Ms. Hughes is not an antisemite." Hughes' website says she's planning to release an ebook in 2013 about her experiences.

Canada slammed on Nazi war crimes file

Country gets failing grade

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Canada's record in bringing Nazi war criminals to justice has earned the country yet another failing grade, according to a report by the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Israel office.

Canada joined Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Ukraine, Australia and Austria with an "F-2: Failure in practice" mark, states Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals, the centre's annual report.

The mark refers to "countries in which there are no legal obstacles to the investigation and prosecution of suspected Nazi war criminals, but whose efforts (or lack thereof) have resulted in complete failure… primarily due to the absence of political will to proceed."

Canada has been given failing grades for several years. According to data compiled in the report, Canada has not filed a single new case since 2003-04 and there have been no new convictions in four years. Efraim Zuroff, author of the report, said Canada's grade should improve next year, as the report will take into account the recent decision of the federal cabinet to strip Helmut Oberlander of his citizenship. Oberlander was a translator in a Nazi killing squad.

Zuroff said there are currently 1,138 investigations underway in 10 countries. A very small number will ever reach trial, perhaps 10 to 15, he suggested.

The report found that in the year up to March 31, 2012, 10 individuals were convicted on charges related to Nazi war crimes, including Ivan (John) Demjanjuk, a guard at the Sobibor death camp.

During the period under review, cases were initiated against six suspects, five in Italy and one in Spain. Germany, Italy and the United States were the only countries to receive an "A" grade, while Spain, along with Hungary and Serbia, were given "B."

The report noted that in the 18 years since Canada shifted to the civil remedies of denaturalization and deportation, 21 cases have been initiated, of which 10 could be considered successes.

IN MEMORIAM
Greg Gates
1952 – 2013

It is with great sadness that we announce the death of our longtime employee and friend, Greg Gates. For over 40 years Greg was a respected and loyal member of the Benjamin Group, serving both as a Funeral Director and senior manager. In his unique way Greg had become an important part of Toronto's Jewish Community, providing sensitive and caring help for over four decades. Greg's larger than life personality will be missed by all who knew him.

The usual bad theatre

From the editor's desk...

It is likely true that no area in the Middle East is being more closely watched presently by governments around the world and their myriad security forces than Syria. Even more than Mali where French soldiers recently put their boots on the ground to fight Al Qaeda Islamists, Syria – one of the historic crossroads joining Europe to Africa and Asia – has become a daily chaos of intra-Muslim cruelty, bloodletting and proxy war.

More than 60,000 Syrians have been killed in the past two years, mostly at the hands of other Syrians and mostly under the direction of Syria's own ruler, Bashar Assad.

The Soviets have invested in his regime. Their fleet docks at the Syrian Mediterranean port of Latakia. But it is the Iranians who keep Assad in the ruler's palace. Tehran has essentially taken over the defence of the Syrian regime.

The fighting in Syria can therefore be seen at various levels: pro-Assad versus anti-Assad; Sunni Muslim versus Shia Muslim; pro-Saudi versus pro-Irani; Al Qaeda Islamists versus Khameni Islamists and so on. And it can also be described as breathtakingly cruel. Neither woman nor child has been spared from the enemy's bloodlust.

The United Nations and even the Arab League have condemned the Assad-inspired slaughter of Syrian civilians. But no outside force has intervened to try to stop it. Nor will they, because to do so risks engaging Iran and possibly, Russia too.

The chaos in Syria, however, has not been confined to Syria.

Like a river of hot, molten lava, it has spilled onto adjacent lands, scorching what it touches.

Syrians fleeing their homes have landed in large numbers in Jordan and Turkey. Neither country wants the refugees. Jordan has since closed its border to them.

Lebanese have fought Syrians. Indeed, some Lebanese are even fighting other Lebanese. Turks have fought Syrians. And the Iranians, of course, are fighting everyone inside Syria opposed to Bashar, their cynical, sinister satrap.

Shots, too, have been fired at Israel. Israel is concerned about errant or deliberate shooting across the border. It is also concerned about the possibility of attempted incursions by terrorists. Thus, the Jewish state is now building a re-fortified fence along its northern border.

But it is justifiably obsessed in ensuring that Syria's known cache of unconventional weapons not finds its way into the hands of Hezbollah, Iran's surrogate, or other anti-Israel forces.

In his column this week, Paul Michaels concisely describes Israel's obsession, "The most pressing security concern for Israel is the looming possibility that, as Syria's civil war rages, the country's chemical weapons could fall into the hands of rebel Sunni Islamic forces or be transferred to the Shia forces of Hezbollah that, under the guidance of Iran, support Damascus. Either way, Israel has made it clear that any attempt to transfer such deadly weapons would be a 'red line' and would be countered."

It was against this background that an aerial strike was conducted last week in Syria, allegedly by Israel, possibly against a convoy carrying anti-aircraft missiles to Hezbollah in Lebanon, or possibly against a research facility where non-conventional weapons were stored, or possibly against a warehouse of chemical weapons, or all of them, or some of them. As of this writing, the true details of the attack are not known.

Israel did not comment on the attack.

But every other nation in the region, it seems, has. And each one outdoes the other in parody, hypocrisy, obscenity and sheer charade.

Leading the race to the microphone was Hezbollah. One of its spokesmen called the strike "barbaric."

Egypt condemned the attack as being illegal. Resorting to the time-worn but phony call to pan-Arab loyalties – and totally disregarding the inter-Arab killing that is the prominent hallmark of current life in Syria – Egyptian Foreign Minister Mohammed Amr disingenuously said, "Such an assault on Arab land is entirely rejected and represents a flagrant violation of the United Nations Charter and international law."

Echoing the Egyptian foreign minister, the head of the Arab League, Nabil al-Arabi, called the strike a "glaring violation" of an Arab country's sovereignty.

And the quite petulant prime minister of Turkey, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, berated Israel even as he goaded and mocked Syria for its passivity against the strike.

Although it was fiendishly sanctimonious, only Hezbollah's indignation was sincere.

Egypt, the Arab League and even the supremely priggish Turkish government were quite pleased with the result of the strike, whatever it was.

Their public reproach of Israel was bad theatre.

And, of course, that is part of the deep-seated, structural problem in the Middle East. Rather than speak truth to their own people and to the world, governments there always prefer to point an accusing finger at the Jewish state.

Security still tops social issues: Israeli pundit

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israelis who yearn for a kind of "normalcy" in which Israel is freed from "existential angst" are labouring under a "sweet illusion," says Israeli journalist and author Yossi Klein Halevi.

In an analysis of the outcome of Israel's recent general election, Klein Halevi said a growing number of Israelis, particularly younger ones, long to focus on everyday domestic concerns rather than on life-and-death security issues.

Yossi Klein Halevi

But because they live on "the edge of a volcano" in a politically unstable and volatile region, their longing for normality is unlikely to be fulfilled any time soon, he told an estimated 800 listeners in a keynote speech to the closing event of the UJA campaign at the Sheraton Centre last week.

It was announced that the campaign has raised $54 million so far from 16,700 gifts. A UJA spokersperson said a dollar goal for the campaign was not set, but that it's running $2 million ahead of last year at this time, and more donations are expected.

Last year's drive raised just over $57 million.

Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem who made aliyah from the United States in 1982, said last month's election opened up a "new divide" between Israelis concerned mainly by socio-economic issues and Israelis preoccupied by an external agenda relating to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

As proof of his argument that security issues trump internal ones, he cited a widely reported incident on Jan. 30 in which the Israeli Air Force bombed a convoy in Syria trucking Russian-made surface-to-surface missiles to Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Klein Halevi suggested that 2013 could well be the "year of decision" when Israel decides whether or not to use military means to stop Iran from building a militarized nuclear arsenal.

Yet Israel is also concerned by other unfolding developments in the Middle East, he noted.

Syria is imploding in a vicious civil war that already has claimed the lives of 60,000 Syrians and internally displaced two million Syrian citizens.

Egypt has been convulsed by instability since the overthrow of Hosni Mubarak's regime and its replacement by a Muslim Brotherhood government.

In a sombre reference to the increasingly tense period before the Six Day War, when Israel was suspended in a state of anxiety and uncertainty, Klein Halevi said Israelis face a similar moment of reckoning today.

Returning to Israel's election, he argued that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was the sole candidate who placed emphasis on foreign policy during the campaign.

He said Netanyahu has shifted toward the centre in an attempt to transform the Likud party into a pragmatic rather than an ideological right-wing party, but Likud hardliners have resisted his moves, placing the party out of step with the centre in Israel.

Klein Halevi said the political centre was generally reinvigorated by the election and now represents a majority of Israelis.

Although the middle-of-the-road Kadima party was crushed, winning only two Knesset seats as opposed to 28 in the 2009 election, Yair Lapid's Yesh Atid centrist party picked up a resounding 19 seats, making it the second-biggest parliamentary faction.

Yesh Atid's electoral success is significant, he observed. Israelis sent a message for change and signalled a desire for balance, realism and moderation from their political leaders.

They also seek an end to cultural wars and schisms, said Klein Halevi, who writes for the New Republic and whose first book, Memoirs of a Jewish Extremist, was an account of his disillusionment with Jewish militancy.

Declaring that Israel can no longer afford to maintain its current relationship with the haredi community, Klein Halevi said that haredi separatism from Israeli society is untenable.

Turning to the perennial Palestinian issue, he said that centrists such as himself are conflicted, knowing that a Palestinian state is both an existential need for Israel and a threat to its long-term security.

"We need to free ourselves from the moral burden of the occupation," he said, referring to Israel's 45-year presence in the West Bank, populated mainly by Palestinian Arabs.

The looming demographic imperative, in which a minority of Jews may rule over a majority of Arabs in Israel and the West Bank one day, is one more reason why Israel should conclude its occupation, he said.

Most Israelis are prepared to make painful territorial concessions to achieve a two-state solution, Klein Halevi said.

They also think that government spending in West Bank settlements should be cut substantially and that a building freeze should be imposed in settlements outside major settlement blocs Israel intends to keep, he said.

Centrist Israelis, however, fear that concessions won't yield a real peace dividend, nor do they believe there is a Palestinian partner willing to engage Israel in a genuine peace process, he added.

Israeli centrists want to be doves, but reality forces them to be hawks, he lamented.

BAKING BREAD: More than 70 young adults gathered Jan. 31 to bake 500 challahs at the Challah for Chesed 500 event organized by The House, a meeting place and educational hub for young Jewish professionals. The challahs were delivered the next day and shared with the residents at Baycrest.

Young professionals help at Out of the Cold

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

An elderly man goes through the clothing racks, looking at the frayed jeans and old sweaters. Nothing catches his eyes, so he moves past them to a row of shoes, and picks up a pair of brown leather shoes with black laces.

"Can I help you get a size?" asks the young woman behind the counter. He tries them on. She bends down to check if the shoe fits, placing her fingers at the tip of the shoe – it fits perfectly. He places the shoes in a box, but doesn't hand her any money – because this homeless man was "shopping" at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue's Out of the Cold program last week. The program serves meals to 100 homeless people once a week for two months, provides them with donated clothes and houses 30 homeless people one night a week.

Without programs like these, 52-year-old Matt Weymark would be sleeping on the streets of downtown Toronto, in -20 C weather, or worse. "There's a problem – there's no place to go," he said. "Most of us will be sleeping outside when these programs end. It's as easy as that."

He wasn't always homeless. Weymark worked as a drywall finisher for 27 years. Since he was self-employed, he wasn't eligible for unemployment insurance when he began struggling a few months ago, and he had his driver's licence suspended. He can't work if he can't drive – he needs to be able to transport his equipment to get the job done.

"I've always worked," he said, lifting his head and staring straight ahead. "I don't like charity."

But without savings and not much family, Weymark had no place to go. On Mondays, he eats and sleeps at Beth Emeth, on Tuesdays, at a church in town, and on it goes. He's hopeful that in May, when his court hearing comes around, he can get his licence back and start earning a living again.

The House, an educational hub and meeting place for Toronto's young Jewish professionals, last week joined Beth Emeth to add something sweet to the Out of the Cold program: dessert. Volunteers spent five hours baking chocolate chip cookies and banana bread, which they served, as a musician played in the background. "We often recognize people's needs, but this addresses their wants," said Coby Segal, tzedek and social action co-ordinator of The House. "We're here to serve people's dignity, which is just as important as their basic survival needs. We want to recreate that experience we've all had – on birthdays and anniversaries when you go out to celebrate – and give it to someone else."

This event was part of The House's Lend a Hand series, in which young professionals volunteer their time to give back to the community. For Chanukah, they made latkes and handed them out to homeless people in Toronto as their Latkes for Chesed program.

"It's not just learning, it's not just volunteering. It's synergy, it feels like both," said Rabbi David Pardo, Jewish educational director of The House. "It's an educational experience fused with meaning."

That's what draws the volunteers.

"It makes me feel good that even when sometimes you don't feel like you're making a visible difference, you are," said Allison Mason, who volunteers with The House. "You learn to give up your own comfort level and give to someone else."

And they wanted to give people living on the streets the chance to feel like those who have homes, even if it was just for one night.

As the volunteers served dessert to the guests, the musician started playing Stand By Me and one woman stood up. She clapped her hands and started dancing, shaking back and forth. She smiled, a wide, huge grin, the entire night.

Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda's Out of the Cold program runs until Feb. 25. Large, warm adult clothing is needed. It can be dropped off at the synagogue office, 100 Elder St.

Netanyahu's agenda

Last Thursday, the Central Elections Committee delivered the official results of the recent Israeli election to President Shimon Peres. Two days later, at the conclusion of Shabbat, after consulting with all the parties that won seats in the 19th Knesset, Peres formally asked Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to form the next government.

Under Israeli law, Netanyahu has 28 days from last Saturday night to assemble a coalition. If he fails to do so within the allotted time, the president may grant him a further 14 days to get it done.

Although our sages warned that since the destruction of the Second Temple, predictions are now the realm of fools and toddlers, it is probably safe to say that it is unlikely that Netanyahu will need the extension. He received the endorsement of six parties controlling 82 of the 120 seats in the Knesset.

But Netanyahu wants his new government to include members from more than those six parties. According to the Times of Israel, at the ceremony with President Peres Saturday night, he seeks to lead "the widest possible national unity government" and urged the party leaders who did not recommend him as prime minister to join him.

Netanyahu's remarks to the president deftly responded to the policy preferences urged by the Israeli electorate. His tone was conciliatory to political opponents and to Palestinian leaders.

He promised to tackle the pressing domestic issues "without tearing our people apart." In other words, his approach will be gradual rather than abrupt regarding such matters as haredi participation in the army, reducing the cost of living and introducing electoral reform.

He appealed directly to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. He pleaded with him "to come back to the negotiating table," saying that every day that passes without negotiations is a day wasted.

On matters of security, which Netanyahu characterized as his highest priority, he was urgent and firm. The security focus would be twofold: Iran and the instability unfolding throughout the region.

The boisterously campaigned but peacefully conducted election in Israel – like the 18 preceding ones – is the most eloquent refutation to the apartheid lie spread by haters of the Jewish state.

All Israeli citizens who are eligible voters had the right to cast ballots. Exactly 67.79 per cent did. Nearly 60 per cent of all eligible Arab Israelis did so, too. The three Arab parties won 9.3 per cent of the votes cast, translating to 11 members in the 19th Knesset.

We hope and pray the new Knesset will be a legislature of mutual respect and dignity and that the next Israeli government – yet to be formed – will be one of wisdom, courage and compassion.

And we hope no day in the search for peace will be wasted.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israeli president Chaim Herzog challenged U.S. Jewish leaders who criticized Israel's policy of beatings and curfews to quell rioting in the West Bank and Gaza. "The question I must ask is what do you see as the alternative?" he said after the American Jewish Congress and voices such as film director Woody Allen publicly and sharply criticized Israel.

We must help Syrians

The crisis in Syria remains a challenge for western powers. The United States and Russia must work together to resolve it. If the outside world intervenes militarily, it will be in the middle of a vast ethnic conflict. If it doesn't intervene, it will be caught in a humanitarian tragedy.

As Jews living in the post-Holocaust era, we ought to be sympathetic to the powerless in war-torn countries. Yes, even with enemies of Israel – as I once heard an Israeli army captain say to his troops in the Golan in the 1970s. Can you tell the difference between an Israeli baby crying out of hunger and/or pain and a distressed Syrian child? We know the answer, yet we do nothing to assist those innocent victims in Syria today. It's shameful what we close our eyes to. The world closed its eyes to us, our relatives in Europe during World War II. The Syrian crisis is a test of our character and values in the West, and yes, the Jewish community worldwide. Compassion is for those who need our assistance – the young, the elderly, the disabled – regardless where they may be. As Jews, we cannot allow the politics of a global event to dictate whether we provide assistance to a group that is being victimized. We must never forget our history of victimization.

Idea for Mideast peace

Using the continuity of the Jewish people in the Land of Israel during the last 2,000 years, it might be possible to convince the Palestinians that at no time did the Jews ever lose title to their homeland, the Land of Israel. Thus the Palestinians might lose the heart to continue the fight against Israel, as the basis for their fight seems to be the idea that Muslims do not let non-Muslims take over Muslim territory. But if the Land of Israel never was Muslim territory, then the possession of the Land of Israel might lose much of its relevance to Muslims. To those who think such a resolution is not possible, one must ask, has such a resolution ever been tried? A lot of other resolutions have been tried with little success. After all, when did the Jews ever surrender or abandon their homeland? Perhaps it's time for something apparently really unusual and different. What, after all, is there to lose with such an approach? It doesn't appear that lives have to be lost on either side with such an approach.

Wants help discovering who he is

I am writing this letter out of some frustration that I feel about a situation that I consider unfair and hypocritical.

My maternal grandfather's name was Siegfried Weinberg. He was a German Jew who was born in Germany. I do not know much of his family, but I guess that the Weinbergs had been settled in Germany for many generations. He married a German non-Jew, and my mother and my uncle were born from that union. All was well until the Nazis came to power. So my grandfather took his family to the United States in October 1939 and then on to Canada. There was a lot of prejudice in Canada then, so my grandfather changed his name to avoid this prejudice.

My mother married a non-Jew, so I am one-fourth Jewish. I am proud of my Jewish ancestry. I am trying to learn about the Jewish faith, and I have a Talmud that I am trying to study. I know that under Jewish law, I am not a Jew. But I feel like a Jew. Most of my mother's family in Europe is gone, because they were exterminated. My mother was called names and spit on when she came to Canada because of who she was and that fact that she spoke only German and Yiddish. A lot of Jews will not give me the time of day because "I am not a Jew." I find this attitude unfair and hypocritical. I am just asking for some compassion and help in discovering who I am.

Passivity not an option as far right rises again

Moshe Kantor
JTA

One of the seminal slogans of the 20th century was the historic refrain "Never again!" This cry that rose from the ashes of the Holocaust was meant to ensure that there would be no repeat of the greatest tragedy in modern European history.

The refrain remains hollow if it remains theoretical verbiage utilized during speeches and ceremonies but lacks any real intent and action.

In recent years, a seemingly long-dormant ideology returned to a semblance of power for the first time since the unconditional surrender of German forces on May 8, 1945. For the first time in well over six decades, political parties that require members to be of "Aryan origin," have full-armed and open-fisted salutes, have logos distinctly resembling the swastika and call for a census of Jews are back in Europe.

These elements are no longer consigned to the beer halls, isolated farm retreats or the margins of European political discourse. They are moving closer and closer to the mainstream.

In fact, this newfound political confidence is reflected in the street, where more and more Jews are being physically and verbally attacked in the open.

The Golden Dawn party in Greece, Jobbik in Hungary and Svoboda in Ukraine are just three examples of European political parties that have moved well beyond the historic far right and still unacceptable discourse of those like Le Pen's National Front in France and the Freedom Party in Austria.

We appear to be entering a new phase in European political history that has extremely worrying parallels with the past. Of course, many will argue that none of these parties currently have great power.

But at what point will their power be too much? It's a question that all decision-makers, opinion-shapers and law enforcement agencies in Europe must ask. Not in a theoretical sense, but in a very real practical sense.

Moshe Kantor

The Jewish people and other minorities who are in the direct line of fire from this maleficent hate have no doubts that this threshold already has passed, and it is having a very real practical effect on the streets. A recent survey found that 63 percent of Hungarians are willing to affirm their antisemitism with no shame.

On Jan. 27, the international community observed International Holocaust Remembrance Day to remember the victims of the Holocaust and learn its lessons. A few days prior, I visited the seat of European governance, the European Parliament, which was the joint recipient of the recent Nobel Prize for Peace, along with other European Union institutions. Along with many others, I lauded the Nobel for the European Union's commitment to peace and its success at unifying a continent that has known so much bloodshed.

However, as Europeans, we cannot afford to rest on our laurels and claim that a lack of war or conflict means that the European Union has succeeded in creating a harmonious and peaceful continent that can prevent future catastrophes.

As the number of Holocaust survivors begins to dwindle, many are witnessing something that would have been unbelievable to them only a few short years ago: the new groups, rapidly increasing in popularity, are emulating and co-opting the policies and ideology of those who murdered their families and brought to them untold suffering.

There are too many Europeans, especially those among its leadership, who remember the death and destruction that follows the Nazi ideology, and we, as Europeans, should do everything we can to rid ourselves of this force that again tries to lay a dark shadow on our continent.

We call on all public figures in Europe – media, cultural or academic – to use their platforms to assist the ridding of this disease. European politicians as a moral mass must adopt stricter legislation proscribing groups that promote hate, discrimination and racism from European political institutions. There must also be a demand for tougher enforcement and punishment, and the strengthening of education toward tolerance.

Some eight decades ago, the National Socialist movement caught many by surprise, and most did not fully comprehend or believe that it would be willing or able to fulfil its genocidal and destructive platform. Living with this dark history in our relatively recent lifetime, we have no similar excuses. We know what this ideology seeks, we know what this racist movement aspires to, and we cannot let it get a foothold again on our continent.

Just as eight decades ago, the Nazi ideology was able to take advantage of a financial recession, we also face similar economic challenges. This is when we must be at our most vigilant. We must beat back the advances of this ideology – not for the victims of the past, but for the possible victims in the future. If we do not, then "Never again!" will remain a hollow term utilized during speeches and ceremonies.

As the prominent Holocaust historian Yehuda Bauer said, "Thou shalt not be a victim, thou shalt not be a perpetrator, but, above all, thou shalt not be a bystander."

Moshe Kantor is president of the European Jewish Congress and co-chairman of the European Council on Tolerance and Reconciliation.

Venezuela reportedly spying on Jews

JTA

NEW YORK — Venezuela's secret service, SEBIN, is spying on the country's Jewish community, according to leaked documents said to be from the spy agency.

Last month, Analisis24, a right-leaning Argentine news website, released 50 documents attributed to the Venezuelan intelligence agency containing private information on prominent Venezuelan Jews, local Jewish organizations and Israeli diplomats in Latin America. The Anti-Defamation League, among others, believes the documents are authentic based on the wealth of detailed and private information included.

The papers include a dossier on Espacio Anna Frank, a coexistence group in Caracas, with clandestinely taken photos of its offices and private information on its personnel, including their home addresses, passport numbers and recent travel itineraries. It identifies the organization as a "strategic arm of the Israeli intelligence agency in the country," the Mossad, and as a front for "far right-wing Zionists" to recruit agents using "subversive socio-political influence."

Other documents say the local Jewish community has benefited from the "political and military interference" of the United States in the South American country's affairs and accuses certain Venezuelan Jews, such as journalist Abraham Belilty Bittan and former parliamentarian Paulina Gamus, of being foreign agents.

The ADL says the report is deeply troubling and is a further sign of the government of President Hugo Chavez's inveterate bias against Jews.

"It is chilling to read reports that the SEBIN received instructions to carry out clandestine surveillance operations against members of the Jewish community, as described in detail in documents leaked by the Argentinean website Analisis24," the ADL said Jan. 30 in a statement. "In a country where the government and some of its followers have publicly accused the Jewish community of disloyalty and where the community's institutions and houses of worship have been attacked, reports of this kind of surveillance add fuel to an already incendiary atmosphere inciting prejudice and hate."

Let's try a different kind of unity

At one time, the slogan for the Combined Jewish Appeal was "We are one."

That line struck me at the time as being, well, a bit disingenuous. Just for one example: the experiences of North American Jews over the past 100 years could not be more different from, say, those of Jews in the former Soviet Union. We lived in peace and democracy, they under hardship and dictatorship. We lived in a world that recognized the freedom to believe, or not, as you pleased. They lived in a world where to enter a place of worship could mean a quick trip to the gulag.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

If the slogan for the United States dollar is "E pluribus unum," "Out of the many, one," ours is the opposite: "Out of the one, many."

We delude ourselves if we keep saying "We are one" and then refuse to realize that we're not – not now, and not in the past.

Israeli Jews are not one. Israel is going through a grave internal crisis, including not only a growing rift between secular and dati, but also a battle between Orthodox-Zionist and haredi. Reading about the haredi "Mod[esty] Squad" attacking "immodest" Orthodox Jews on the street in Beit Shemesh makes you wonder if you're reading about Islamist extremism.

Israeli and Diaspora Jews? Israelis are more divided, more nuanced, while the organized Diaspora tends to be hardline, often ignoring other Israeli voices in the centre. As well, those of us in non-Orthodox congregations want our Judaism acknowledged and supported.

North American Jews are not one. What we call modern Orthodoxy has, in its approach to the role of secular education and the role of women, widened the gap between itself and the haredim. The latter see the study of Torah as the only meaningful way to live a Jewish life. Modern Orthodoxy finds itself under pressure, not to say attack, when it articulates its approaches to secular education, role of women, and the "outside" world in general.

We haven't been one since Emancipation in Europe, beginning with the French Revolution and continuing in North America, finally reaching eastward. And even before that, Jews in Europe had different experiences than Jews in Muslim lands.

Ancient Israel? After David and Solomon, it split into two kingdoms, Judah and northern Israel, who fought with each other and with each other's enemies. Go figure. The slogan would not have applied to them at all.

Certainly, Jews who, in the 13th century and beyond, argued that the works of Maimonides should be banned – with sad consequences – were not feeling at one with his philosophy. Jews who tried to get Chassidim arrested by Czarist police were not feeling at one.

Slogans such as "We are one" rely on a Jewish past where we all lived in harmony and goodwill, all prayed in the same shul, all observed the commandments in joy and song. It was a very comfortable past – and totally mythical.

How can we begin to make us one, when we're clearly many?

Why not start with the past? I quote Prof. Tina Loo of the University of British Columbia in Canada's History magazine (February/Marach 2013): "Although we use 'history' and 'the past' synonymously, they're totally different things. History isn't chronology or past events; it's an interpretation, an argument [my emphasis] about the past. That means it's inherently contentious. It will alienate and inspire – and we should expect and welcome that."

We can't expect to get the present right if we live with a past that's inaccurate. What is that wonderful saying? "The past is a different country. They do things differently there."

When I taught Jewish history, I tried very hard to make it uncertain. There was no inevitable outcome: "They tried to kill us, a miracle occurred, we were saved, let's eat." Jewish history, if it teaches us anything, tells us that we struggled as much among ourselves and between our respective communities as we did resisting the dangers of the outside world.

Now most of us are inside that world, once so forbidding. We have a chance, never before offered us, to enrich both worlds. If some reject that chance, they can certainly give the rest of us the opportunity.

Surely after all these millennia we can live without assuming we are one and respect our differences. It's a different kind of one-ness. Let's give it a try.

Death with dignity

There's a great deal of discussion in the media and cocktail circuit today about the legalization of assisted suicide. The prevalent terminology is "death with dignity."

Once again, we're faced with a moral issue whose parameters are clouded in nomenclature. How one phrases the debate seems especially poignant and persuasive. Is it suicide, or is it a form of murder? Or is it some form of choice that's bound up with a human right to self-determination. These extremes aren't invented for the sake of argument, but are indigenous to the realities of our lives and endings. Our beginnings are so joyous. What about the endings? They can be brutal, and many of us face them in a terrifying vacuum.

The first requirement however, is to avoid the superficial elements that seep into the debate. Many of the requirements for a patient's humane treatment at the end of life are already available. There are all sorts of patient care packages and hospice choices that make those last days or months less intrusive, less full of emergency procedures and hospital healing protocols. Choices are already embedded into our health-care system.

However, to my way of thinking, dying is not laced with dignity. The end of life of someone loved is hostile, painful, dreadful, foul, raw and repulsive. Death violates life, and, therefore, is violent, no matter how much we wish to view it as peaceful. The essence of life is gone and we know not where. We're left with a loss, an eternal emptiness, as the body dissolves into rotting matter. Where is the dignity?

Our tradition continually shouts: choose life. In all its facets, it reaches out for life-sustaining and supporting rituals, education and healing. When it comes to dying, the goal is to fight death, to try all manner of therapies, even to violate the Sabbath in order to heal. So how will Judaism face this new movement to allow patients and their families death choices at the end of a life?

I understand the problem. We now prolong life with all kinds of cures and lifestyles. Yet there are diseases and disabilities that cripple and crush us – some beyond belief and beyond our ability to suffer. Wouldn't it be better, and morally preferable, to allow someone to exit this world knowing that life will soon become intolerable?

How can I watch my wonderful, beautiful mother – my mother who took care of everyone – become a vegetable, a prisoner in her own bed. Yes, I know the horrors and indignities. I also know the impossibility of making the right choice, of assuming to know what to do. I know of the real abuses, of human weakness, of children and other heirs' temptations. The desire may be to inherit or to be free of a burden.

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

It's way too easy to clothe the argument in the moral high ground of "death with dignity." It's too easy to hide one's own thinking even from oneself. I wish I could do more for Mom. I wish I knew what to do. Three years ago, the doctors told us she had six months to live. I don't pretend to understand. I do know there's no dignity, and I don't pretend to be able to extract any.

Judaism teaches that we must give the dying the basics of life: water, food, that which is necessary to breathe. We don't have to perform extraordinary actions, but we may not starve the patient. On the other hand, we shouldn't prevent death from happening in its natural end of life pattern.

There's a talmudic story of a great rabbi who was dying. His students gathered round his bed, praying with such fervency that his soul could not depart. He suffered. His maid understood. She made a loud, shocking noise, and the prayers stopped. In that moment, his soul took flight. From that story, our legalists learn that we need to allow death to take place when it is time. We have both positions stated. No assisted suicide, but let death take its place. No extraordinary means necessary, but don't starve the person.

The Talmud doesn't pose the question as a moral one with dignity as the goal. Life is the goal. But death is the reality. It has its place. Just don't dignify it.

Arab parties will be shut out of coalition

The process of assembling a coalition government in Israel after a general election is fraught with surprises. One never knows which parties the premier will snub or invite into the cabinet. But one factor never changes.

As Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu launches the horse trading that will ultimately determine the composition of Israel's next government, he will likely abide by tradition and refrain from asking any of the three Arab parties in the Knesset – Balad, Hadash and the United Arab List-Ta'al – to join forces with him, even though they hold a fairly respectable number of seats.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In the time-honoured exercise of coalition building in Israel, every seat generally counts. Yet not a single Israeli prime minister, from David Ben-Gurion to Ariel Sharon, has ever invited an Arab party to sit in government.

Arab politicians have been asked to support this or that policy or initiative. Yitzhak Rabin, for example, relied on Arab parties to pass the second Oslo peace agreement in 1995. But he stopped short of bringing Arab parties into his cabinet, thereby condemning them to perpetual opposition and raising concerns that the Muslim and Christian Arab minority in Israel, comprising 20 per cent of Israel's population, would continue to be marginalized.

These ruminations spring to mind now that Israel's Jan. 22 election has come and gone.

As the election campaign unfolded, one of the issues that bubbled to the surface was whether voter turnout in the Arab community would dip below the all-time low of 53 per cent, which was registered in the 2009 election.

Analysts claimed that a majority of Arabs, worn down and disillusioned by the perception that their grievances are not treated seriously by Jewish decision-makers, would boycott the election.

Haneen Zoabi, an Arab member of the Knesset, spoke to this scenario when she said, "Arabs have stopped believing in the democratic tools at their disposal." What she meant was that Arab voters feel they cannot change the status quo.

Samah Salaime Egbariya, chair of Na'am, a non-profit organization dedicated to promoting the rights of Arab women in Israel, offered a similar explanation. Arabs, not having been fully integrated into Israeli society, might succumb to despair and stay at home on election day.

Fearing that a boycott would enhance Netanyahu's chances of winning another term, the Arab League's Palestine division issued an unprecedented appeal to Arabs urging them to vote.

Weighing in on this issue, Ahmad Tibi, an Arab Knesset member, told the New York Times: "In South Africa, people were killed struggling to have one person, one vote. In Israel, there is discrimination in every part of life – education, infrastructure, employment. In only one thing there is equal rights: the day of the election. One person, one vote. Those who are not participating are shooting their own legs."

As it happened, Tibi's fears were misplaced. Obliterating predictions that the Arab participation rate would sink to unprecedented depths, Arabs turned out in far greater numbers than anticipated, with 56 per cent deciding to vote. (By comparison, the Jewish voting rate was 70 per cent.)

In some Arab towns, particularly Kfar Kassem, Jaljulya and Sakhnin, the turnout was much higher than expected, topping the 70 per cent mark.

Compared to the 1999 election, when 75 per cent of Arab voters showed up to vote, the Arab turnout this year was unimpressive. In hand-wringing commentaries prior to the election, Arab parliamentarians and academics noted that Arabs might have won 20 seats and become the second largest bloc in the Knesset had a lot more voted.

As usual, most Arab voters cast their ballots for Arab parties, with the United Arab List-Ta'al, Hadash and Balad winning 11 Knesset seats, equalling their performance of four years ago.

Few Arabs supported Zionist parties, underscoring the scale of Arab alienation and disaffection from mainstream Israeli society. Nevertheless, a handful of Arabs ran on Jewish tickets. One such candidate, Ayoub Kara, a Druze from the town of Isfiya on Mount Carmel, represented the Likud–Beiteinu party list no less. In Netanyahu's last government, he served as minister for development of the Negev and the Galilee.

Kara, however, is an anomaly.

Arab members of the Knesset, representing a blend of religious, nationalist and communist parties, tend to focus on external issues, principally the Arab-Israeli conflict. When they deal with domestic matters, they usually espouse radical views that are clearly at odds with Jewish Israeli norms.

Zoabi and Tibi illustrate this thesis.

Zoabi (Balad) was a passenger aboard the Turkish ship Mavi Marmara, which was trying to break Israel's naval siege of the Gaza Strip. When it was intercepted by Israeli commandos in the Mediterranean Sea in May 2010, she was detained. Consequently, the Central Elections Committee banned her from running in last month's election. The order was overturned by the Supreme Court, and Zoabi regained her seat.

Haneen Zoabi

Zoabi got into trouble again in 2011 when she called for a third Palestinian uprising in the West Bank. In response, a Jewish MK recommended that she be stripped of her parliamentary immunity.

Tibi (United Arab List-Ta'al), the Knesset's deputy speaker, aroused the ire of some Jewish MKs last April when, on a trip to Ottawa, he called for a boycott of companies and products linked to Israeli settlements in the West Bank.

Both Palestinian nationalists, Zoabi and Tibi are animated, in part, by a well-founded belief that Israel's 1.4 million Arab citizens, though equal under the law, are victims of widespread discrimination and racism.

Arabs in Israel are treated unfairly in the allocation of funds for health, education, housing and municipal services, as well as in employment opportunities. In the past, they have endured expropriation of their lands.

In a piece in New York City's Jewish Week, Robert Cherry, a member of the UJA-Federation of New York's Taskforce on Arab Citizens of Israel, addressed this issue head on. As he wrote, "Israel can claim to be a full democracy only so long as it treats its Arab minority fairly."

Conditions in the Arab sector have improved markedly since the 1960s. Military rule in Arab towns and villages has been abolished. The infant death rate has dropped significantly. The proportion of Arab students graduating from high school and university has marginally increased. Arabs have been appointed ambassadors in Israel's diplomatic corps, and an Arab justice sits on the Supreme Court. Israel is placing industrial parks in Arab municipalities in a bid to diversify their economies and create jobs.

But across the board, the gap between Jews and Arabs remains yawningly and depressingly wide. Even integrated and successful Arabs who profess loyalty to Israel cannot completely identify with the symbols and narratives of the Jewish state. According to the 2012 Israeli Democracy Index, 44 per cent of Arabs in Israel take pride in their Israeli citizenship, but 20 per cent are "not so proud" and 30 per cent are "not at all proud."

These figures, to some extent at least, explain why only 56 per cent of Israeli Arabs bothered to vote in January's election.

U.S. has better record

Two of the 10 suspects left the country voluntarily, but "to date... not a single one of the eight persons who appealed against the decision has been deported and seven of the eight have since died in Canada." Six others died in the course of proceedings against them.

"I know Canadians hate being compared to Americans, but the fact is that the Nazi war criminals and collaborators (in the countries) are the same," Zuroff said. The United States has a much better record of deporting Nazi war criminals. From 2001 to March 31, 2012, the United States was responsible for 39 of the 99 convictions registered worldwide.

"The results achieved by the Americans clearly underscores the professional excellence and dedication of the (Justice Department) agency and the critical role played by political will in the prosecution of Holocaust perpetrators," the report states.

Zuroff said the centre's "most wanted" list includes several with ties to Canada. Ladislaus Csizsik-Csatary, who left Canada rather than face deportation, currently lives under house arrest in Hungary. He was charged on July 17, 2012, with torturing Jews in the Kosice, Slovakia, ghetto. Csizsik-Csatary served as a senior Hungarian police officer in Kosice, where he allegedly helped organize the deportation of 15,700 Jews to Auschwitz in the spring of 1944.

Another Canadian high on the list of most wanted is Vladimir Katriuk. Katriuk was stripped of his Canadian citizenship in 1999, but in 2007, a Federal Court reinstated it. The Wiesenthal Center says subsequent research by Swedish historian Per Anders Rudling implicates Katriuk personally in war crimes in Belarus. Zuroff said he has forwarded the new information to Canadian authorities but Rudling has not been contacted by Canadian prosecutors.

Contacted by The CJN, the Justice Department declined to comment on specific cases. However, department spokesperson Stephen Slesso stated, "Since 1987, the government of Canada has upheld its policy to ensure that this country does not become a safe haven for people involved in war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide... The government remains committed to identifying, preventing entry, locating, apprehending, prosecuting, detaining and removing those individuals who pose a safety and security risk or threat to Canada."

Zuroff, author of Operation Last Chance, acknowledged that little time remains to bring Nazi war criminals to justice. It may be that Canadian governments of all political persuasions "never considered this a priority," he said. "And it's possible the Jewish community lost interest and considers it an issue that's going nowhere."

That's an assertion that Shimon Fogel disputes. Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) said bringing Nazis to justice "is a priority for us. It has been for the last three decades."

CIJA did push for a fresh look at the Oberlander case, which led to the revocation of his citizenship, but it is aware of only two other suspects – Katriuk and Wasyl Odynsky – who could be subject to legal actions.

"It's not that the government is not willing to investigate cases. There are no cases," Fogel said. "I think the government is not just implicitly but explicitly committed to this."

"I don't think the government is hesitant or shy to do the right thing about alleged Nazi war criminals. The reality is that in 2013, and each year after, it becomes less likely to find people still living that fit in that category," he said.

Antisemitic graffiti found on yeshiva

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Antisemitic graffiti was found on a Toronto yeshiva late last week.

According to reports, Mishkan HaTorah Yeshiva at 3452 Bathurst St. was defaced some time overnight between Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. When students of the yeshiva arrived on the morning of Feb. 1, they found swastikas spray-painted all over the walls of the building.

It's the second time vandals have attacked the institution.

The school has asked the Toronto Police Service to increase security around the area. The incident is still under police investigation.

Minister for Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney issued a joint statement on Feb. 1 with Minister for Natural Resources Joe Oliver, the MP for the area, denouncing the act.

"We condemn, in the strongest possible terms, this act of hate against a respected educational institution. Any act of vandalism is deplorable, but vandalism directed against a specific religion or race is particularly loathsome and has no place in Canada, a peaceful, pluralistic nation that cherishes freedom of religion and the rule of law," they said.

"We hope that the bigoted cowards responsible for this act of intimidation are caught and punished. Our thoughts and prayers are with the students and staff of the Mishkan HaTorah Yeshiva, the Jewish community in Toronto, and everyone who has been affected by these cowardly acts."

Observant women too lace'em up to learn hockey

Rena Godfrey
Special to The CJN

The women's locker room at Baycrest Arena in Toronto is crowded with hockey bags and sticks.

There's a chatty excitement about as 13 women take off their street clothes, gear up in full hockey attire and hang their sheitels on hooks.

It's a Tuesday morning in January, the temperature is -13 Celsius outside and not much warmer in the rink, but that doesn't stop these determined women from coming out to learn to play hockey.

Channa Merkur plays hockey twice a week.

This is the third season for this all-women's group, a gathering of frum (observant Jews) and non-frum women, along with a token non-Jewish participant, who come together each week to participate in a hockey skills class run by the Avenue Road Hockey Association.

Although most of the women are mothers ranging in age from their 20s to 40s and come from different religious backgrounds, they share a common passion for hockey, as well as a desire to learn new skills, meet new people and have fun.

Their coach, Paulina Jakarsezian, a 22-year-old non-Jewish student who plays hockey for Ryerson University, enjoys working with the group because of their non-competitive and supportive nature.

"Skate, skate, skate, " she smiles in between blowing her whistle.

The puck passes back and forth between orange triangular cones. High fives can be heard above the swish of skates. One skater bumps into another, followed by a row of apologies. Someone falls on the ice, laughing as they hit the ground. Everyone cheers when they get up.

Frum women playing hockey in Toronto is not all that common. Channa Merkur, 40, and a mother of eight, first became interested in the sport while watching her boys play about four years ago.

Born and raised in England, Merkur didn't even know how to skate when she first approached Stacy Toban, the registrar of the Avenue Road Hockey Association, who also plays with this group. Merkur wanted to join an all-women's hockey group, but was disappointed when she learned that the coach was a man.

Merkur, however, is not one to give up easily and helped connect Toban with a female coach. Merkur also wanted to attract Orthodox Jewish women to the hockey program and sent out a message to an online social networking group (meetngreet@yahoo.com) that caters to more than 1,000 observant Jewish women in Toronto.

Six women enthusiastically responded, and although the group has more than doubled in size since then, Merkur wishes more frum women would join in on the fun.

After their first hockey class, Merkur and a friend fondly described their experience as "the best thing they ever did."

Merkur was especially happy to play hockey with people outside of her immediate community.

"It was fun, it was novel, it was outrageous. In my mind we introduced something new to the frum community, because we were breaking down negative frum stereotypes that I assume some secular people have," she said.

Many of the other women interviewed echoed Merkur's sentiment. They also talked about hockey being a much-needed break in their everyday lives.

Merkur agrees. " I consider my hockey time [to be] my sanity saver, my untouchable time."

Lindy Wolff, 31, one of the frum participants, her bandana peeking out of her helmet, proudly shows off her hockey outfit once she's finished dressing. She is only in her third week of classes, but says her family is thrilled that she's playing.

Carole Freeman, 47, originally signed up for the exercise, but she especially loves the camaraderie and the feeling of being part of a group.

She also enjoys going out for lunch with all the girls sometimes after hockey, sharing their common stories about children, families and life.

A woman lacing up her hockey skates nearby agrees that playing hockey in this mixed environment has given her the opportunity to break out of her insular social circle.

"Because I grew up in a sheltered community, it's nice to know different people and learn about their different sides. When it comes to playing hockey, we talk about our kids, we talk about their schools, family vacations and kids that were up all night. We're really all the same."

Kashruth Council drops appeal in labour case

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — The Kashruth Council of Canada has withdrawn its appeal to the Ontario Labour Relations Board of an order to pay 57 mashgichim $10,000 after it was found to have violated provincial employment standards.

On Aug. 16, a Ministry of Labour inspection found that during five months in 2011, the Kashruth Council, which oversees the COR kosher symbol, violated the Employment Standards Act (ESA) in its payment of 57 present and former mashgichim (kashrut supervisors) with respect to minimum wage, vacation time, work hours and public holidays.

The ministry ordered the council to pay about $10,000 in total to the mashgichim, which it did.

But last fall, the Kashruth Council alleged that the $10,000 was the result of "calculation errors" by ministry inspectors and that it intended to appeal the ruling. It also denied that it had strong-armed the 57 mashgichim to sign a settlement after accusations of coercion, based on leaked emails, were published on an anti-haredi blog.

Ultimately, 54 of the 57 mashgichim signed releases waiving their share of the $10,000 that was being held in trust by the Ministry of Labour. The remaining three, who were entitled to a total of $140.92, were paid in December, and the balance – more than $9,800 – was returned to the Kashruth Council.

"[The Kashruth Council] is not taking anything out of the pockets of any of our mashgichim," said spokesperson Richard Rabkin. "The funds are simply being returned by the ministry as is the normal course in matters such as these."

In light of the settlement, the council withdrew its appeal on Jan. 4.

"[T]he only matter... left from the audit were the compliance orders, [which] simply restate the requirements that the employer comply with... the ESA," Rabkin said.

But he added: "Because the Kashruth Council of Canada is compliant with the ESA, there was no reason to proceed to challenge the orders," Rabkin said after the money was returned.

The council bases this claim on the report of one ministry inspector in an earlier case who found that its compensation went above and beyond the ESA.

The agency employs some 100 mashgichim, most of them part time.

Allegations of labour irregularities first came to light in a November 2011 case concerning former mashgiach Morley Rand in which the Kashruth Council initially claimed mashgichim were holders of "religious office" and, therefore, not subject to the ESA.

However, the Ministry of Labour ruled against the Kashruth Council, saying that Rand was entitled to overtime. Final details of Rand's case are scheduled to be heard this spring.

Following the inspection and audit last August, the ministry demanded that the council bring its practices in line with the ESA by Sept. 21, 2012.

But the Kashruth Council, which is self-funded and receives no financial support from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said there would be no change to its pay policies.

"[O]ur executive met to discuss this very issue and voted that if our policies have been upheld by the Ministry of Labour... and our policy is more favourable for over 95 per cent of our mashgichim, then we should continue these practices," Rabkin said.

The Kashruth Council pays overtime for any shift longer than 10 hours, plus twice-yearly holiday bonuses, while the ESA calls for overtime to kick in after a 44-hour work week.

Since 2011, COR has continually asserted its support of front-line employees.

"Despite the challenges," Rabkin said in an earlier statement, referring to the possibility of future investigations, "[the Kashruth Council] will continue to do the right thing... we are confident that we will continue to successfully pass muster with the ministry."

Charitable group helps with kids' medical costs

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Aaron's Apple, a charitable organization started by a child to help other children, funds the high costs of medication and treatment for families whose children suffer from chronic illnesses.

At the age of seven, Aaron Maresky was determined to make a difference in the lives of other children, while simultaneously battling his own chronic illness.

"I was taken to the hospital with terrible stomachaches, and I stayed in the hospital for two weeks," Aaron, now 11, said. "I had many, many needles and tubes put everywhere. Sometimes I was really sore and it was very scary. I missed three months of school and I lost 30 pounds.

Aaron Maresky and his mom, Mandy, co-founders of Aaron's Apple.

"The doctors told my parents that I had Crohn's disease, and I would require a very special medicine given to me by infusion every six to eight weeks. My medicine costs more than $40,000 every year," explained Aaron, co-founder of Aaron's Apple.

For many children suffering from chronic conditions such as Crohn's, ulcerative colitis, rheumatoid arthritis and pediatric cancer, the only option to ease their suffering comes in the form of high-priced medical treatments. Aaron's family had a plan that covered his medication, but he recognized the harsh reality that not everyone was so fortunate, and that many parents had no choice but to stand by helplessly and watch their child suffer.

"Every time Aaron went to the hospital, he would give a donation, in efforts to help make another child feel better. From this grew the charity called Aaron's Apple," said Aaron's mother, Mandy Maresky, co-founder of the charity.

Aaron's Apple will host its second annual Caring to the Core Gala on March 2, at The Warehouse Event Venue in Downsview Park, 35 Carl Hill Rd., where guests will enjoy New York-inspired cuisine and entertainment, including celebrity appearances and a silent auction.

"Aaron's Apple's tag line is, 'Take a bite and change a life.' New York is also known as the Big Apple. We want people to 'Take a bite out of the Big Apple' and change a life," Mandy said.

The charity is run solely by volunteers and works with the Hospital for Sick Children. "Everyone involved is dedicated to helping as many children and families as possible. Aaron's Apple has recently been approached by physicians of children suffering with cancer to assist with the costs of their chemotherapy treatments," Mandy said.

Having raised more than $220,000 to date, Aaron's Apple continues to help families cope with overwhelming medical costs. The inability to afford the required treatment for their child places enormous stress on them.

Arab, Jewish panellists 'share frank opinions'

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

How can Canadian Arabs and Jews meet to mend historic divides? How can they reduce conflict and improve understanding between their communities? How can they counter hatred and promote human rights for those living here and in Israel?

These complex and pressing questions were addressed at a recent event sponsored by JSpaceCanada, a Jewish pro-peace group, and the Canadian Arab/Jewish Leadership Dialogue Group.

The program, titled "Courageous Conversations: Arab Jewish Relations in Canada," was held Jan. 24 at the Barbara Frum Library.

Moderated by journalist Ralph Benmergui, who identifies as a Jew born in an Arab country (Morocco), the discussion featured four representatives of the dialogue group.

The panellists included Raja Khouri and Karen Mock, the founders and co-chairs of the organization, and longtime members Maurice Green and Jareer Khouri.

Mock is the former executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, Raja Khouri is president of the Canadian Arab Institute, Green is a labour, and human rights lawyer, and Jareer Khouri is a senior adviser to the attorney general.

The evening was part of an effort to promote peaceful dialogue, co-operation and a greater understanding of Arab and Jewish culture, politics and history. The dialogue group contends that neither community benefits from tensions, violent conflicts, public accusations and racist exchanges.

"It is important for progressive Jews and other Canadians to hear about our dialogue experience over the last several years. Our dialogue group presents a model for our mainstream communities to build relationships and positively relate to each other," Raja Khouri said.

"We share frank, honest and direct opinions," Jareer Khouri said. "For the Arab and Jewish communities to change their perspectives, both sides must have the courage to voice different opinions."

The dialogue group, founded in 2007, was created in response to the increasing hostility between Jewish and Arab communities, which was mainly demonstrated in conflicts on university campuses. Mock said the idea for the group was born when she was chair of the attorney general's Hate Crimes Community Working Group in 2006.

Raja Khouri, former president of the Canadian Arab Federation, and Bernie Farber, then executive director of the Canadian Jewish Congress, were both members of that committee. They began talking to each other to defuse conflict situations between their two communities and work out practical resolutions to meet both Arab and Jewish needs.

While the panellists agreed on the importance of being able to put themselves in each other's shoes, they also discussed the challenges of achieving understanding and respect for the other's point of view.

Raja Khouri said there's "a perceived orthodoxy" on each side and any person who speaks outside the orthodoxy is endangering themselves.

"I've been attacked by some in my own community, as have Jewish members whose opinions don't mirror the so-called mainstream. In terms of the honesty of the discussion, it takes a long time to get there, and it took us approximately two years to build the foundation of trust before branching out to others."

Jareer Khouri said most Canadian Arabs believe the Jewish community is "monochromatic" when it comes to Israel.

"We have to move away from the impression that no criticism of Israeli policy is possible in the Jewish community, and we must also dispel the impression that Arabs don't criticize events and policies in the Arab world."

Mock said reasonable criticism of Israeli government policy is not antisemitic. She also clarified the meaning of Zionism as "Jewish self-determination."

Green said the result of shared respect and trust each is "honest conversation through which people come to appreciate why you hold the views you do."

Shul donates renowned chazzan's music collection

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue has donated the bulk of Cantor Louis Danto's music collection to Florida Atlantic University in Boca Raton, which is home to one of the largest Jewish music collections in the United States.

The world-renowned cantor, who died in 2010, served the congregation for 25 years. He was known for his bel canto style of singing, a demanding 17th-century technique that he studied in Rome after World War II.

A native of Suwalki, Poland, Danto survived the war because he was sent to Minsk in 1939 at age 10 to study music on a scholarship. He and his fellow students were relocated when Germany invaded Russia.

Cantor Louis Danto

Over a five-decade career, Danto amassed a vast amount of sheet music, records, tapes, CDs and books. The cantor and his wife, Rouhama, donated the collection to the synagogue in 2005.

But according to Beth Emeth's executive director, Pearl Grundland, the Jewish music archive at the 50-year-old university can provide "proper exposure and accessibility to people around the world" that the synagogue can't match.

> 'Cantor Danto was a concert artist, so his library represents a performance library'

"The cantor was really beloved by Beth Emeth and all the members," Grundland said. "There's a lot of emotional attachment to the collection, but I would say anyone involved in this decision made the decision believing that this would be the best long-term home for the collection."

Aaron Kula, the FAU libraries' director of music performance and education, said he has known the Danto family since he was a child, because his father was also a prominent cantor.

"We always kept in touch to see if there was any possibility they might interested in gifting the collection to Florida Atlantic University," he said, adding that the school's music archive grew in large part because of the number of donations from Jews who had moved to South Florida after retiring.

The Danto collection includes books of sheet music dating back to the 1800s and cantorial, Yiddish and opera recordings that are "almost considered priceless," Grundland said.

Danto travelled the world to perform in concerts, and wherever he went, he looked for special music, Rouhama Danto said. "What he really wanted was for it to be used."

Kula told The CJN that Danto built "an amazing world-class library… [with] sheet music in virtually every European language that exists, and there's a wealth of one-of-a-kind cantorial music [in manuscript form] that he used. Those pieces are not published. They were handwritten… and they must date back to at least the early 19th century."

Kula called the collection "a major acquisition" for the library.

As of last week, the 97 boxes of music were still waiting to be shipped from Toronto, pending resolution of customs details, Kula said.

There are at least 10,000 pieces of sheet music, according to Kula. Each of them will be put into a searchable database, although the time frames for completing the work depend on how many people will be involved.

As well, recorded music will go to the university's recorded sound archives.

"I think the goal of the Danto collection will be not only to preserve it, but to use it in performances," said Kula, whose responsibilities include creating performance events using the university's print music collections.

"Cantor Danto was not only a cantor but a concert artist, so his library represents a performance library," Kula said.

"I'm very excited about getting it. I can't wait for the boxes to arrive."

The university's print music collection is online at http://www.library.fau.edu/depts/spc/spc/printmusic.htm, and its Judaica sound archives can be found at http://faujsa.fau.edu/jsa/home.php.

Eating Jewish is sweet at Shoresh

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Did you ever wonder why honey is kosher? We dip apples in honey for Rosh Hashanah, and many have seen the custom of placing dots of honey on alef-bet letters at a boy's upsherin (first haircut). Yet, no other product from a non-kosher animal is itself kosher. Even the rabbis of the Talmud, Rabbi David Pardo said at the second annual Shoresh Food Conference on Jan. 27, wondered why it was allowed.

Rabbi Pardo spoke alongside beekeeper Fred Davis in a session called, "Oy Rabbi, Bees Make My Honey!" The Talmud gives two answers, he said. First, the bees aren't manufacturing the honey from their bodies – they just transport and store it, and second, because the Torah expressly permits it – in a lengthy, indirect way.

Rabbi Pardo of The Houase, a meeting place for Jewish students and young professionals, pointed out that the one reference we might think offers blanket permission to eat honey – the verses that call Israel a "land of milk and honey" – actually refer to sticky-sweet date nectar.

Davis, known in Toronto foodie circles for his hive share program, offering super-local honey to chefs like Jamie Kennedy, enlivened talmudic passages with vivid descriptions of how bees bring nectar back to the hive to "sell" it to others, offering directions via an intricate figure-8 "waggle dance." Honey itself never goes bad, Davis said. Honey was once found, still fresh, in an ancient Egyptian tomb.

"It's not the stings that bother me so much," Davis said of his career as the urban beeman. "It's shlepping around town" to check on hives atop the Four Seasons Centre, Casa Loma and other out-of-the-way locations to comply with safety provisions of the Ontario Bees Act.

"Beekeeping is not a money-making enterprise," he said. But on top of the many advantages of local eating, the truth is, it's "wonderful, wonderful honey." While supermarket honey is uniformly golden year-round, his clients experience two seasons of honey: a light, fresh, floral taste in the spring, and a dark, bold honey that resembles a stout beer around Labour Day.

As part of a conference discussing almost anything to do with Jews and food, Davis called his work, "doing a little bit of tikkun olam… to 'green' our city a bit more."

Shoresh executive director Risa Alyson Cooper opened the all-day conference at the Miles Nadal JCC, which drew well over 100 participants, by asking, "What does it mean to eat Jewishly?" Can we call something kosher if it contains genetically modified organisms (GMOs), if it's served in Styrofoam, if animals have suffered or if pesticides were used? "Should we expand the definition of 'kosher'?"

Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs runs educational activities and grassroots initiatives rooted in Jewish social and environmental values, including the Kavanah Garden at the Lebovic Community Campus, community-supported agriculture sites around the GTA, and Bela Farm, a donated 92-acre property in Hillsburgh, Ont., which, when complete, will be the largest Jewish educational farm in North America. In November 2012, Shoresh was awarded a $100,000 Joshua Venture Fellowship for its work toward creating "just, vibrant and inclusive Jewish communities."

Last year's conference – inspired by the Hazon Food Conference in the United States – may have been the first, but it's nothing new for the Jewish People, Cooper said. "Our community has been exploring its relationship with food for 5,000 years."

Rabbi Ed Elkin of Toronto's First Narayever Congregation, who spoke on "Not Your Bubbie's Brisket: Biblical Meat Eating," said the lively sessions proved that "a lot of our people really care," and that the community has a responsibility to help them "connect with… texts and traditions in a joyful Jewish way."

Other sessions touched on Israeli politics, the biblical "migrash" (open land) as a model for an urban greenbelt, planning a vegan Passover seder, the history of Toronto's Jewish food, farming, kosher certification and many more issues.

Following a vegan lunch, participants socialized between sessions while voting for the "quintessential" Jewish food (challah won, hands-down, over entries like cholent, pickled herring and shakshouka) and bidding in a silent auction to raise funds for Shoresh.

And at the end of the long day, even exhausted participants rallied for breakout sessions ranging from "Gluten Free Anonymous" to "Kosher Local Organic Meat" and "Starting a Jewish Farm." A farm that might even contain bees, as Bela Farm will someday.

Oh – and the reason honey doesn't spoil, Davis said, is that the bees fan the watery nectar until it reaches a moisture content of exactly 18 per cent, too low for bacteria and fungi to survive. Local gluten-free baker Sara Lapell picked up on the Jewishness of the number 18. "That must be what makes it kosher," she joked.

Another bee miracle? With over 20,000 known kinds of bees (only a few make enough honey for us to share), Davis said a new species was discovered in 2010 just around the corner from the conference, on Bloor Street. There may be nothing new under the sun, but there's always something new to learn at a Jewish food conference.

Addressing questions about eating meat

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Even meat-eaters have a hard time dealing with the "yuck factor" of the biblical sacrifices, said Rabbi Ed Elkin at the Shoresh Food Conference on Jan. 27.

Whether meat eating even has a place in an ideal world is up for debate, Rabbi Elkin said.

Some say sacrifice and slaughter, intricately connected in the Torah, were a concession to our frail human natures. Maimonides, Rabbi Elkin said, believed the sacrificial system was God's way of "weaning" the Jews off idolatry and channelling them toward the one true God. Other commentators differed, including Nachmanides, who said sacrifices were part of the divine plan all along: "God puts in the Torah what God wants us to do. Maybe we don't understand, but it's an ideal."

Temple Sinai takes part in URJ networking project

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

For Nathalie Rethazy, a co-chair of Temple Sinai Congregation's young families committee, it's important to show her children that she's "involved, and that the synagogue is our community, our second home."

Rethazy – along with Temple Sinai's Rabbi Daniel Mikelberg, Rabbi Ilan Emanuel and nursery school principal Bibi Golberg – travelled to Chicago recently to take part in a three-day conference run by the Union for Reform Judaism (URJ), the umbrella group for 900 congregations.

Rabbi Daniel Mikelberg

Temple Sinai, a 1,700-family congregation, was the only Canadian synagogue among 32 at the late January conference, where the URJ launched three of its new "communities of practice," or congregational networking groups.

The groups, which will collaborate for the next 18 months, revolve around

- emerging young adult initiatives
- successfully engaging young families, and
- pursuing excellence through the congregations' early childhood centres.

Rethazy said it was a "phenomenal" weekend and that, in the next year and a half, she hopes to connect with people she met at the conference and pick up new ideas that she can use at the temple to engage young families.

"It was lovely to come together as a whole and know that we're all in the same boat," she said.

Recent young family initiatives at Temple Sinai include tot Shabbats, home Havdalahs and mitzvah days.

Golberg and Rabbi Emanuel, who is in charge of young families programming at the temple, work with the same cohort of congregants.

Golberg noted that many parents "are looking for Jewish opportunities rather than just secular choices." As well, she added, parents want to be more involved in their children's Jewish education.

"We're looking at how we can reach these young families," she said.

"This is the first step, where we are going to be working together creating some new programs that will come out of this."

According to a URJ news release, participating congregations will work together to "push the boundaries of existing congregational efforts, experiment in their own communities, receive peer support and guidance," as well as learn from URJ faculty.

At the conference, the organization's president, Rabbi Rick Jacobs, worked with each group, and URJ faculty member Amy Asin led workshops on experimentation and evaluation.

Rabbi Mikelberg, who is in the "young adult" community of practice group and works with congregants in their 20s and 30s, said that "the hope is to join together congregations across North America focusing on similar challenges. The idea is that we can help each other to grow and blossom and embrace this challenge."

He said Temple Sinai's programming for young adults focuses on social action, a social aspect, and an "entrepreneurial" series that offers mentoring opportunities.

"It's all about synagogue life and community life, and supporting one another."

One change in recent years, Rabbi Mikelberg said, is that synagogue life is no longer contained within the walls of the temple. Most of his programs are off site.

Although the other synagogues represented at the conference are American, those in big cities share similar challenges and opportunities, Rabbi Mikelberg noted.

"It's definitely very exciting. I now feel I have colleagues across North America, with whom I can brainstorm."

Tikkun olam at heart of service day

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Just because you aren't good at fundraising doesn't mean you can't take part in community service.

That's the idea behind Mitzvah Day International, a British organization that co-ordinates events around the world on a predetermined day each year. Alan Simons is in the early stages of planning a Mitzvah Day to take place in Canada on Nov. 17, at the same time as the international activities this year.

"For me, it's not always about raising money," he said. "I'm not very good at that, I admit, and I think there are many other people who are rather uncomfortable or not good at it."

He said Mitzvah Day Canada was inspired by the many British Jewish organizations that devote resources to projects for young adults, usually aged 20 to 35. Mitzvah Day has incarnations all over the world, for example, in Australia, Turkey and the United States.

Mitzvah Day International describes itself as a Jewish-led day of social action with a mission to reduce hardship and poverty, help the environment and bring a little hands-on joy without fundraising.

Simons, who is originally from England but lives in Toronto, said he has heard several of his English friends talk about Mitzvah Day. He quickly realized it was a perfect project for someone like him, who loves to help the community through action.

The event has become so big in England that politicians including British Prime Minister David Cameron and London mayor Boris Johnson have supported it, urging people of all backgrounds to join in the efforts.

British MP Eric Pickles, left, and Mitzvah Day International founder Laura Marks, right, plant a hedge with volunteers at a local park on Mitzvah Day 2012 in England.

Although the event is Jewish-led, based on the idea of tikkun olam (repairing the world), Simons, 72, said he hopes there will be other groups joining in the effort to help the community.

Some of the mitzvot might include cleaning up a park or cemetery, bringing children into a retirement home to give joy to seniors, or holding a book drive. The options are endless, but the most important part is that the individual participants or groups decide on their own what they would like to do, Simons said.

While this will be the first official Mitzvah Day in Canada, it isn't the first time individuals and groups have run something similar. Many organizations have led their own Mitzvah Day projects, but it has never been a co-ordinated effort, which is what he hopes will happen.

Although the planning has just begun, Simons said he's received a lot of positive feedback from community members, synagogues and more.

"I'm hesitating to be over-optimistic but I'm very delighted in terms of what's happening now," he said.

The next step is to form a planning committee to determine a strategy, he said. He knows it will take some work to get the project off the ground, but it has to start somewhere.

"One can't sit back and just wait for things to happen," he said. "You have to try and see where you go."

A key difference in Jewish divorce law

There is little that can divide a family like money. It's depressing to think of families torn apart fighting over inheritances, business deals or child succession roles. Throw in a divorce and extreme wealth and watch the fighting escalate.

The Ontario Superior Court recently overturned a spousal support waiver signed by Christine McCain, daughter-in-law of the founder of the McCain food empire, arguing that it was signed under duress. The court felt that a $5-million settlement, especially after 30 years of marriage, was just too little, considering the approximately $500 million net worth of her ex-husband.

While such huge amounts of money were unknown in talmudic times, our sages had to deal with similar issues, albeit on a smaller scale. In the world they lived in, it was the husband's duty to support the wife, and there was no obligation or expectation that the wife would work outside the home. A father would support his daughter until marriage, at which point obligations of support were handed over to the husband. If the husband came from a wealthier family, he was obligated to raise his wife's standard of living to his own. And if he was poorer, he would have to work hard, as he was not allowed to lower her standard of living from that which she was accustomed to. In other words a wife's standard of living could only rise because of marriage.

This obligation of support was absolute. There was no obligation or expectation that the wife should work to help out. She could choose to do so, and in such cases, the money she earned would go into the "family pot" and would not be specifically hers. Nonetheless, a woman could opt out of the system and keep all the money for herself, provided she waive her right to support from her husband.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

In the unfortunate situation of divorce, Jewish law looked to ensure that neither spouse would have to deal with the other as they rebuilt their lives. The Torah term for a divorce – popularly known as a get – is actually sefer kreitot, meaning a book of separation. Unlike the western system of monthly alimony – forcing people who may (sadly) hate each other to deal with one another – Jewish law opted for a one-time payment, allowing spouses to sever all ties if they were so inclined. The amount was specified in the ketubah, likely the first prenuptial agreement.

While a minimum amount was required for all, higher amounts could and would be demanded from those able to afford more. Furthermore the assets that a woman brought into a marriage were enumerated in the ketubah, ensuring she could claim those assets upon divorce.

The women would then move back to her parental home or live on her own, but had no further claims on her husband's assets. If and when she remarried, her second husband would be responsible for her support. To the best of my knowledge, a woman would not be entitled to claim a higher settlement solely because her husband made millions. Of course, Jewish law does not work in a vacuum and would need to take into account the law of the land.

'Biography' of Jacob emphasizes payback for bad behaviour

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

Yale University Press has been publishing biographies of famous Jews, in a series called "Jewish Lives." The latest release is Jacob: Unexpected Patriarch, by Yair Zakovitch, emeritus professor of Bible at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. As Zakovitch himself admits in the introduction, it would be a stretch to call this book a biography. It is actually a close literary reading of texts in the Bible, some that are clearly about Jacob and others that Zakovitch argues are about Jacob, even though they do not appear to be. The book was published in Hebrew two years ago and has now been translated into very readable English by the author's wife, Valerie Zakovitch.

Zakovitch describes the Jacob story as akin to a theatre production in which we can watch the action unfold but we don't really know what the characters are thinking. He notes, as have many scholars of biblical narrative, that the narrator rarely tells us how to assess the characters.

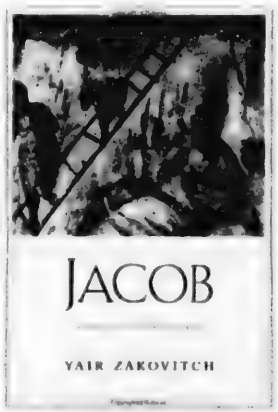
Still, Zakovitch states that "the story of Jacob's life was not put into writing simply to recount what occurred." The most constant message that he identifies in the Jacob stories is retribution for misbehaviour. In the middle chapters in Genesis, Jacob purloins his older brother's birthright and blessing. Zakovitch argues that the Bible gives Jacob his comeuppance for these deceptions again and again.

The idea that Jacob's actions come back to haunt him later in life is not new. It can be traced back to early midrashim and was later made famous by Martin Buber and by Nechama Leibowitz. Recall that Jacob, at his mother's instigation, fooled his blind father, Isaac, into thinking that he was Esau in order to get the blessing meant for the firstborn son. He carried out the deception by taking his brother's clothes without permission and putting goat skins on his arms to make them feel more like those of the hairier Esau (Genesis 27). Later Jacob's future father-in-law, Laban, fooled Jacob by having him marry his older daughter, Leah, when Jacob was hoping once again to put the younger, Rachel, before the older (Genesis 29). And later yet, Jacob's sons deceived him tit for tat by stealing the clothes of their younger brother, Joseph, and covering those clothes with the blood of a goat (Genesis 37).

But aside from these well-known examples, Zakovitch finds a series of other payback stories about Jacob, which to the best of my knowledge are his own insights.

In Genesis 26, Esau comes home from the hunt one day and is famished. He asks Jacob for some food, which Jacob will provide only in exchange for Esau's birthright. Esau complies, relinquishing his birthright and receiving bread and stew in return from Jacob. Zakovitch notes a series of striking similarities between this story about two brothers and the story of the conflict between the two sisters, Rachel and Leah, now both married to Jacob.

One day Leah, the older one, had some mandrakes that Rachel wanted. Leah was willing to give them to her sister only as part of an exchange: Jacob had been scheduled to spend the coming night with Rachel and instead he would spend it with Leah. The deal was, so to speak, consummated (Genesis 30). Zakovitch notes a number of inversions here. In the Esau-Jacob story, the older brother asks the younger for something; in the Leah-Rachel story the roles are reversed. In both stories, the one with the goods asks for something more important in return and gets it. And as Zakovitch puts it, "Jacob, the slick negotiator in the first story, is transformed into negotiated goods in the second." He adds, pointedly: "When it comes to women, whether mothers or wives, Jacob's passive acquiescence can be assumed."



In another example, when Jacob ran away from Canaan, fearing for his life after fooling his brother, the two specific items that he prayed for from God were "bread to eat and clothing to wear" (Genesis 28). We recall that Jacob had used precisely those two items – bread to buy Esau's birthright, and clothing to steal his blessing. Later in the Torah, notes Zakovitch, roles are again reversed. In Numbers 20, Jacob's descendants, the Israelites, are on their way to Canaan from Egypt and they need a favour from their "cousins," the Edomites, the descendants of Esau. The Edomites refuse to sell them water, which Zakovitch sees as more payback for the saga of the coerced purchase of the birthright.

Readers who like such literary analysis of the Bible ought to enjoy this book. But they would have to either know the narratives of Genesis very well or read the book with a Bible open at the same time. Readers should also be warned: Zakovitch indulges in some unconvincing biblical criticism, often not supported by texts. For example, he is convinced that the story told in Genesis 38 of the birth of Tamar's twin sons, Peretz and Zerach, was once a different version of the story of the birth of Esau and Jacob, yet he presents no convincing evidence for this conclusion. His attempts to explain many texts as reflecting political tensions in Israel in the period of the First Temple (the approximate time of the composition of these stories, according to Zakovitch) impressed me as speculative at best.

Furthermore, there is barely a positive word about Jacob in the whole book. I found this hard to swallow. My guess is that many people might be irritated by the consistent belittling of our patriarch. A more balanced and more uplifting treatment of the life of Jacob, also filled with literary insights, is Rabbi Shmuel Klitsner's Wrestling Jacob: Deception, Identity and Freudian Slips in Genesis (reviewed in these pages in 2007). Other scholars who have offered sensitive literary insights (without the attitude) include Robert Alter, Yoel bin Nun, Leon Kass, and David Silber.

But fans of the Bible who are willing to overlook, or are not troubled by, the issues that I raise will find delight in Zakovitch's skilled literary analysis of the Bible.

Engagement strategy brings Jewish life to students

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Hillel's newest intern program has introduced 645 Toronto students to 20 Jewish programs and organizations in the past five years, said Stephanie Krasman, assistant executive director for Hillel of Greater Toronto.

The goal of the Campus Entrepreneurs Initiative, she said, is to create meaningful Jewish relationships with students on campus. Typically, an intern would approach Jewish students and invite them out for meaningful Jewish conversation usually over coffee.

"There's an authentic Jewish element to this work," Krasman said. "Ultimately, it is about making an enduring commitment about Jewish life."

Through the program, which has been established in three cities across North America, Hillel hires interns who work solely to engage Jewish students on campus and introduce them to Jewish programs and organizations, Krasman explained.

Miriam Borden, a University of Toronto student, is one of eight "engagement" interns with Hillel of Greater Toronto. She described herself as a perfect example of the program's results.

"I came from 12 years of Jewish day school and a year at yeshiva, and I do Jewish studies, so I figured I don't really need Hillel," she said, adding that there were all the "usual turnoffs," such as the perception of Hillel being too cliquey or uncool.

She said she vowed never to set foot in Hillel and succeeded until one of the interns last year sought her out. She agreed to go for coffee with the intern and discussed her interests, which included slam poetry. After a few meetings, the intern suggested she plan her own slam-poetry storytelling event.

"So here I was, involved in planning a Hillel event," Borden said, laughing. "I'm proof that it works."

To find these Jewish students, the interns often use Facebook first to look for people they know and then look at their friends' networks, said Borden, who describes social media as the best outreach tool.

To learn networking techniques, interns attend a weeklong Hillel training course in St. Louis, Mo. During the school year, they meet 20 times for two-hour leadership training and development seminars. "Last year this meant the interns were exposed to 66 hours of leadership development and 30 hours of Jewish learning," Krasman said.

In total, she said she contacted about 30 people last semester, and estimated that 20 responded, and she "engaged" with 15. Most of these people were found on Facebook, although being a Jewish studies major means Borden can also find many people in class.

"It's amazing when you really see how far you can really expand your network," she said. "It's like a rubber band where it could be smaller or bigger as you like it."

The peer-to-peer approach is what makes the program such a success, Krasman said. "When students think back to their Jewish experience on campus, they'll think of the intern they had this amazing relationship with."

Interns are instructed to be upfront about their mission. From the very first message, they let people know they are part of Hillel and are interested in speaking to them about ways to get involved in Jewish life.

Borden described the approach as a bit of a delicate dance, given that she's approaching people who may not always identify as Jewish all the time, and she's asking to speak to them about their religion.

The program is helping her prepare for her future career, which she hopes will be in Jewish education. "[The internship] brings me in touch with what's going on in the emergent Jewish community, the young people who are the next generation of people sending their kids to Jewish schools and camps," she said.

While Borden said the program has been very beneficial to her, she won't participate again next year. Hillel limits interns to one school year in order to refresh their network, giving them a chance to reach a new group of Jewish students each year.

However, she said she will leave the program with a large network of professional connections.

"I know important names now – important people in Jewish community work. And they might know my name, which is pretty cool," she said.

DID THE LOSS OF A FAMILY MEMBER BEFORE JUNE 14, 2010, RESULT IN A CORONER'S INVESTIGATION AND AUTOPSY?

IF SO, IT IS POSSIBLE THAT AN ORGAN WAS RETAINED AFTER AUTOPSY.

When deaths are investigated, pathologists sometimes retain an organ for further testing to help determine the cause of death.

In the past, family members may not have been notified that an organ had been retained. Now, families are routinely notified when an organ is retained and their wishes are sought regarding how the organ should be treated after testing is complete.

The Ontario Forensic Pathology Service is reaching out to anyone for whom the loss of a family member before June 14, 2010, resulted in a coroner's investigation and autopsy.

Immediate family members and personal representatives (i.e. those responsible for administering an estate) are invited to contact us to find out if an organ was retained in their case.

Some organs that were initially retained are no longer available due to the practices of the time. Others are still at the hospital or forensic pathology unit where the autopsy took place. In those cases, affected families and personal representatives may now request that the organ be sent to a funeral home for cremation or burial. Expenses will be covered by the Ontario Forensic Pathology Service and the Office of the Chief Coroner.

Remaining organs retained before June 14, 2010, will be respectfully disposed of beginning on June 14, 2013. This is in accordance with regulations made under the Coroners Act.

A toll-free telephone line has been set up. Contact us at 1-855-564-4122 or visit our website at Ontario.ca/OrganRetention.

Brooklyn College department to co-sponsor BDS event

JTA

NEW YORK — The political science department at Brooklyn College reportedly will be an official co-sponsor for an event in support of the BDS (boycott, divestment and sanctions) movement.

The Feb. 7 event will feature Omar Barghouti, the co-founder of the BDS movement, and Judith Butler, a Jewish academic who openly speaks sympathetically about Hamas and Hezbollah, according to the New York Daily News, which wrote an opinion piece decrying the event.

Barghouti has compared Israelis to Nazis, according to the newspaper.

A representative from the college, however, said the event does not demonstrate that the department endorses the BDS movement, which advocates the boycott of Israeli products, but that the "department's support is simply for providing a forum for discussion and debate about the topic. Nothing else is implied."

The primary host of the event is the Brooklyn College Students for Justice in Palestine, a group that says it is aimed at "helping end Israeli apartheid and the illegal occupation of Palestine."

The Jewish Community Relations Council (JCRC) of New York strongly condemned the college's decision to lend its name to the event, writing to JTA that "while we vigorously defend academic freedom, we believe that these freedoms do not extend to faculty and academic bodies exploiting their association with the university to enhance their biased and hateful agenda."

The JCRC called on the political science department to remove its name from the event.

Harvard Law Professor Alan Dershowitz has referred to the BDS movement as one of the most "immoral, illegal and despicable concepts around academia today."

Herzog Hospital to display kids' artwork

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

More than 150 winners of Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital's latest awareness campaign, the Windows to the World – Kids Helping Kids – children's art competition, were honoured at a recent awards ceremony.

Some 700 people from across Canada attended the ceremony held at LeParc Conference and Banquet Centre in Concord, Ont., on Jan. 27.

About 13,000 children and teens, aged four to 19, submitted artwork for the competition from schools and camps in nine provinces and the Yukon Territories. Some of the art was submitted independently.

A panel of seven judges, including well-known Canadian artists, selected 177 winners from the submissions, based on the artist's age, use of colour, composition, artistic skill, message and creative design. The winning entries came from Nova Scotia, Manitoba and Ontario – and even one came from a Canadian citizen living in Romania.

One of the 25 grand prize winners was Li-elle Rapaport, a Grade 8 student at Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School in Toronto. She won with a picture based on the theme "dazzling dream." The 25 grand prize-winning pictures will be displayed in the children's respiratory unit of the Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem.

"When I found out the art was for a children's respiratory wing, I thought of bubbles filled with good air, full of hope and colour and happy things," Li-elle said. "Each bubble, like each child, is unique. I hope my bubbles will make the children happy."

Rhonda Wolfond, the project development director for the initiative, "partnered the Woodbridge Art School & Gallery with the Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital.

"The initiative was structured to introduce charitable and community values to children and to demonstrate to them that, through participation, they can make a difference to the global community," she said.

Noa Daniel, a teacher at Leo Baeck Day School's north campus, said he introduced the program to his school "because it was a natural fit, a wonderful program for a great cause. Besides building bridges, we were building a community and comfort for children in need through artistic expression."

Seven posters were created from the winning submissions. In addition, there were 14 Platinum Honour Awards and two educational scholarships to the Woodbridge Art School. In addition, the judges selected one picture from each poster for the categories Best Message (also won by Li-elle) Best Creative Design, Best Use of Colour, Special Effects Award and Artistic Skill Award.

The winning pictures that are not going to the hospital will be displayed in seniors homes, schools, shelters, medical offices, banks and public venues across Canada.

The awards ceremony included a silent auction with an opportunity to purchase the winning posters. Guests who wished to view the award ceremony and winning art as a keepsake could purchase a video produced by Richard Saunders and Raisyl Mandel of Redstone Pictures, who were also recipients of an award for philanthropy.

Student interns developed and implemented the awareness campaign. "Once it started to grow, it exploded," said intern Jenna Himelfarb.

Upon completion of Herzog Hospital's new respiratory unit in 2013 – to be housed in the Samson Medical Pavilion, which is currently under construction – international youth ambassador Madeleine Venn-Mitchell, along with Himelfarb, will go to Israel with the winning pictures.

"Thanks to the Windows to the World initiative, beautiful artwork will decorate each room in the new children's respiratory unit," said Dr. Yehezkel Caine, director general of the Herzog Hospital.

Canada warns Hungarian Roma not to seek asylum

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canada is taking a proactive role in dissuading Hungarian and Roma asylum-seekers from choosing it as a place of refuge.

A month-long $13,000 billboard, bus-shelter and radio ad campaign by the Canadian embassy in Budapest targeting the industrial city of Miskolc – home to the largest Roma population in Hungary – is advising would-be applicants to Canada that the immigration system here has changed and they best be aware of the fact.

The announcements, which began on Jan. 16, read as follows:

"An announcement from the Government of Canada. To deter abuse, Canada's refugee system has changed. People with unfounded claims will be sent home faster. Learn more: www.cic.gc.ca/change."

Jason Kenney, Canada's minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, has long proclaimed that Hungarian Roma have been abusing Canada's immigration system for years.

A billboard in Miskolc, Hungary, announces changes to Canada's immigration policies.

In 2008, after visa restrictions were lifted, a new wave of Hungarian Roma began seeking refuge in Canada.

In early 2012, Kenney characterized most of the Roma claims as "bogus" and pushed for immigration reform after a spike in Hungarian asylum seekers in 2011.

According to the ministry, Hungary was Canada's No. 1 source country for asylum claims in 2011, with more than 4,400 applicants.

Canada's immigration laws changed in 2012 with the passage of Bill C-31, the Protecting Canada's Immigration System Act.

Hungary was put on the government's designated country of origin list (DCO) late last year. Canada considers DCO-designated states to be democratic and as having institutions and laws to assist and provide protection for minorities.

Alexis Pavelich, press secretary for Kenney, said in an email that Canada continues to "take pride in the compassion" of its asylum system.

"We continue to resettle more genuine refugees than almost any other country in the world. In fact, our government is increasing the number of refugees Canada resettles by 20 per cent," Pavelich wrote. "But Canadians have no tolerance for those who abuse our system and seek to take unfair advantage of our country at great expense to taxpayers.

"To date, less than $3,000 has been spent on this public awareness campaign. A total of $13,000 has been budgeted, but a total cost will not be known until the campaign is completed. This cost is significantly less than the average of $30,000 it costs Canadian taxpayers per bogus asylum claim. Accordingly, every single unfounded claim that we can prevent from being made as a result of this public notice returns real savings for hard-working taxpayers."

The Canadian Roma community took exception to the government's campaign in Hungary last week, saying it was motivated by stereotypes and racism and did not take into account the reasons Roma want to flee the EU-member state.

Panning the government's information campaign, Gina Csanyi-Robah, executive director of Toronto's Roma Community Centre and chief spokesperson of the Canadian Roma community, accused Canada of condoning continuing human rights abuses by far-right Hungarian nationalists against her people.

Listing Hungary as a DCO doesn't take into account the rising xenophobia and antisemitism taking hold there, she said.

Members of the nationalist Hungarian opposition Jobbik party have recently made overt statements against Roma and Jews, while its paramilitary offshoots have gone on marches to verbally and physically attack both Roma and Jews in recent years.

"What the Canadian government continues to do in Hungary in its efforts to discourage Roma to seek asylum in Canada is absolutely wrong," Csanyi-Robah said. "It… encourages the continued shaming and hatred directed at the [Roma] community for 'ruining Hungary's good name' and is genuinely interfering into the refugee asylum process by making Canada appear as a country to not seek safety in. When will this barrage of insulting, unjust behaviour ever end? When in our history as a country has the Canadian government ever engaged in such activities?"

Kenney's office noted that in 2009, it engaged in "a similar public notice campaign" for residents of Mexico and the Czech Republic.

In February and March 2001 the ministry also ran a four-week anti-fraud campaign both domestically and abroad "against crooked immigration consultants and marriage fraud." It featured TV and Internet ads, announcements in Canadian airports and on flights, and ads in "mainstream and ethnic print" media targeting potential immigrants from the Philippines, India, and China, Citizenship and Immigration Canada said.

In a Jan. 16 story on hvg.hu – Hungary's leading online economic and political magazine – Miskolc Mayor Kriza Ákos was quoted saying he was "outraged" at Canada's campaign and that his city would forbid any Roma refugees returned by Canada from finding housing or apartments if they had sold or given up their homes in order to seek asylum.

Akos said he's asked the Canadian embassy why his city was targeted for the campaign, but has not received a satisfactory answer. The ministry told The CJN it focused its messaging on Miskolc because it "has been the No. 1 source area in Hungary for asylum claims in Canada."

Holocaust education award announced

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney has announced the creation of a new award for Canadian Holocaust educators.

Kenney took part in a Jan. 27 memorial candlelighting and wreath-laying event hosted by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem in Toronto as part of International Holocaust Remembrance Day.

His ministry has established a one-time, $5,000 award in 2013 for the middle school or high school teacher who best exemplifies instruction on the historic genocide.

The Award for Excellence in Holocaust Education comes as Canada gets set to chair the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA), starting in March and running until it cedes the chair to a new holder in 2014.

Former Liberal MP Mario Silva will be the chairperson during Canada's term.

The award money will be given with the understanding that it "be reinvested in Holocaust education" at the winner's school.

The award winner will be announced at the IHRA Conference – formerly the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance, and Research – in Toronto in October.

For details on the nomination process and requirements, visit cic.gc.ca/holocaust-award.

Kingston shul gets new rabbi, goes Conservative

Sam Zimmerman
Special to The CJN

KINGSTON, Ont. — With the official installation of both a new rabbi and a new shul board on Jan. 25, Beth Israel Congregation, Kingston's oldest shul, has completed its transition from an Orthodox synagogue to a Conservative one.

For 14 years, under the leadership of Rabbi Daniel Elkin, the 102-year-old synagogue maintained an active and engaged community, said Richard Kizell, Beth Israel's treasurer as well as a longtime member.

However, after Rabbi Elkin retired in 2012, congregants decided the time had come for a change.

"Our community has changed in terms of its philosophy and demographic over the years," said Michael Springer, the newly installed president of Beth Israel.

"In the beginning, our shul was made up of immigrants, primarily Ashkenazi, who weren't necessarily Orthodox, but believed in a strong Orthodox ritual. [But] over the last 30 or 40 years, most of the congregants had begun to align with the Conservative movement. Certainly, that's the case today."

The change in religious affiliation better suits the needs of the synagogue's members, such as their desire for more liberal and egalitarian values, Kizell said.

Many young Jewish families who have recently come to Kingston have voiced some of these ideas, he added.

"I think seating was the No. 1 issue. There were more and more people that had quit our synagogue because they found separate seating offensive to them," he said. "There were always people that wanted more women's participation in the synagogue, and over time, that desire grew."

Indeed, there has been a complete change in women's roles and participation in Beth Israel's liturgy, such as counting women as part of a minyan and allowing them to be have Torah aliyot.

Women are encouraged to participate in the congregation's religious and spiritual services, said the shul's new spiritual leader, Rabbi Shalom Plotkin.

Springer said the transition to a Conservative synagogue has been very well received by a majority of the Kingston Jewish community, which numbers about 1,100 people.

"Since this transition, we haven't looked back," said Rabbi Plotkin, who arrived in July. "We've had a minyan every single weekend, every Shabbat, and we're proud of that. People are coming to read, to pray, and to sing together, and also to learn Torah together."

Not surprisingly, the recent change has not been well received by everyone, and the synagogue has lost some members as a result, while others are at odds with the transition, but remain members because they can still connect with the shul's programming, Springer said.

Rabbi Shalom Plotkin, Kingston's Beth Israel Congregation's new rabbi (Barry Kaplan photo)

But he stressed that members can expect great things under Rabbi Plotkin's leadership.

By drawing on significant experience from previous pulpits in the southern and eastern United States, Rabbi Plotkin said he hopes to bring new energy and members into the growing congregation, which had 142 member families as recently as 2009.

After completing his degree in ancient history and business management at the University of Maryland, Rabbi Plotkin received his ordination at the Jewish Theological Seminary.

He said he and his wife, Elise, and his two daughters, Hannah and Elyana, have received a warm welcome from the Beth Torah congregation and the Kingston Jewish community.

"The families and members of the synagogue have invited us into their homes," he said.

Alongside his responsibilities at Beth Israel, Rabbi Plotkin has become involved in many parts of the Kingston community, particularly with staff and student leaders of Hillel at Queen's University, building on the relationship Rabbi Elkin established.

"One of the most significant changes apart from the transition of the synagogue has been that the Hillel at Queen's has grown exponentially," Rabbi Plotkin said. "There seems to be a connection between some of the students and the local Jewish community, and I'd like to see even more connection."

The relationship between Hillel and the shul is mutually beneficial, said Josh Freedman, president of Queen's Hillel.

"Beth Israel offers us the infrastructure to cater to the needs of Jewish students. Moreover, we try to advertise to their events as much as possible in an attempt to foster a broader sense of community," he said.

Both Springer and Rabbi Plotkin said they're optimistic about the future of Beth Israel.

"Over the next 100 years, I'd like to see us strengthen our ties to Israel, and also, strengthen our ties within the community," Rabbi Plotkin said. "My vision is to build community and bring people together. I'd like to see the synagogue meet as many of the spiritual needs of the members as we can."

Observant Jew elected to mayor's office

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — He's the first kippah-wearing Jew to become mayor of a Montreal borough – the city's largest – and the job lasts only another nine months.

But Lionel Perez is still intent on making a real difference in Côte-des-Neiges-Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (NDG).

Perez was acclaimed as interim mayor of Côte-des-Neiges-NDG two months ago, when Michael Applebaum left to become the city's interim mayor after Gerald Tremblay resigned. Perez hopes to return to his previous position as councillor for the borough's Darlington district – a position now vacant – when the next municipal election takes place in November.

Israel faces threats from the north and south

Instability, chaos, violent upheaval, economic failure and massive uncertainty continue to plague much of the Arab world. "Arab Spring" is a term rarely heard these days, except in an ironic sense. In this climate, Israel remains a rare case of stability, even as surrounding strategic threats mount.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The most pressing security concern for Israel is the looming possibility that, as Syria's civil war rages, the country's chemical weapons could fall into the hands of rebel Sunni Islamic forces or be transferred to the Shia forces of Hezbollah, which, under the guidance of Iran, support Damascus. Either way, Israel has made it clear that any attempt to transfer such deadly weapons would be a "red line" and would be countered.

On Jan. 27, Israel completed the deployment of two Iron Dome missile batteries in the north as protection against missiles from Syria and Lebanon that could carry chemical warheads.

Israel has also drawn a red line at the transfer of advanced Russian-made anti-aircraft missiles from Syria to Hezbollah. These missiles pose a severe risk to Israeli fighter aircraft and are considered to be "game changers" in the regional strategic equation. On Jan. 30, western media reported that Israeli jets had struck a convoy carrying Russian SA-17 anti-aircraft missiles from Syria to Lebanon near the border. The Globe and Mail's Patrick Martin cited Israeli analyst Mark Heller's remark that Israel (which remained silent about the attack) was sending a message to Iran as much as to Hezbollah and Syria.

Israel is also concerned about ongoing turmoil in Egypt. What began as peaceful protests in Cairo's Tahrir Square on Jan. 25 soon took an ugly turn. On Jan. 27, Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi declared a state of emergency in three cities – Suez, Port Said and Ismailia – following anti-government protests and riots that left scores dead. Violent clashes even returned to Cairo.

"The past two days in Egypt looked at times like a slow-motion repeat of the revolution that toppled Hosni Mubarak two years ago: the marches, the gas, the shouted demands to topple the regime, and a miscalculated response by [Morsi]... Two years of transition and seven months of [Muslim] Brotherhood administration have failed to restore a sense of accountability," the Economist wrote (Jan. 28).

By the middle of last week, events seemed to be spiralling out of control, with Morsi floundering and speculation swirling about whether the army might step in. Much of the media coverage focused on the clash between Islamists and secular reformers. But what's really driving popular discontent is the failure of the government to address the tremendous economic distress gripping the country.

In the Jan. 29 National Post, Matthew Fisher noted: "The economic prospects of young Egyptians have been grim for years. According to statistics compiled by the government, the unemployment rate of those between the ages of 15 and 29 reached a staggering 77.5 per cent last year – against an official national unemployment rate of 12.6 per cent."

While this is true, the economy has only declined since the Brotherhood gained power. Tourism, upon which Egypt relied for billions in revenue, has died. Foreign investors, never large in number, have mostly fled. And the International Monetary Fund, which pledged almost $5 billion to Egypt, insists on austerity measures, including Cairo's significantly reducing its large subsidies for necessities such as fuel and wheat – a move that would further strain an already deeply impoverished population.

Fisher said that it's "unfair to think that Morsi could have turned Egypt's decrepit economy around after only a few months in power," but he doesn't point to even one positive step Morsi and the Brotherhood have taken on their own. Indeed, they were more concerned about consolidating power and ramming through a new constitution written by the Brotherhood.

The failure of governments across the Arab world to deliver on the real needs of their citizens is nothing new. Neither are the terrible regional consequences that such instability breeds.

Chassidim to lose control of daycares

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The management of its network of subsidized in-home daycares is being taken out of the hands of the chassidic community.

Radio-Canada reported that Quebec's Ministry for the Family and Seniors will close the office that runs the network on Feb. 11 because of non-conformity with a number of regulations.

There is no accusation of misappropriation of funds.

The network, which has been in existence since 2006, consists of 122 daycares in private homes providing 487 places for preschool children at the government-subsidized rate of $7 a day.

Those spots will remain available, but the running of the network is to be the responsibility of two bureaus that manage daycares in the Côte des Neiges district.

Radio-Canada reported that the network has received close to $20 million in funding since its creation under Premier Jean Charest's Liberal government.

Through the access to information law, the public broadcaster learned that ministry inspections found "hundreds" of administrative infractions by the network's office, such as incomplete files, non-existent agreements with parents, the absence of an "educational project" and references on those responsible for the daycares.

The office also failed to provide the ministry with its enrolment figures, which are essential to determine the level of subsidization.

Alex Werzberger, head of the Coalition of Chassidic Organizations of Outrement, told The CJN that the "community will try to negotiate a solution with the government whereby the daycares can remain under chassidic control.

"Nothing so wrong has been done. The children are well taken care for," he said. "The problem is really one of not keeping up with the paperwork.

Family Minister Nicole Léger's press attaché Bruno-Pierre Cyr did not return messages from The CJN for comment on this story.

Netanyahu seeks unity government

The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last Saturday night promised to establish "the widest possible national unity government" and urged even those political leaders who did not recommend him as prime minister to reconsider and join him.

Netanyahu spoke immediately after President Shimon Peres, at a ceremony at the President's Residence, formally charged him with the task of forming the next government.

Netanyahu said the first priority of his new government would be thwarting Iran's effort to attain nuclear weapons. He also pledged to seek peace, saying "every day that passes" without negotiations with the Palestinians is a day wasted, and urging Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to come back to the peace table.

Netanyahu, who was recommended as prime minister by 82 of the 120 incoming members of the Knesset, also pledged to try to heal many of Israel's internal divides – on equality of military service, on easing economic burdens and on electoral reform – "without tearing the nation apart."

He said Israel had weathered the global financial crisis in large part because of the stable government he headed these past four years, but that the economic and security challenges in the region were actually becoming more grave. The dangers facing Israel were the worst it had faced for many years, he said.

Therefore, although his next government would tackle domestic challenges, Israel's security would come first, and the top priority would be thwarting Iran's nuclear weapons drive "and other threats to our nation and our citizens."

Reaching out to potential coalition partners from the centre and left, he pledged his government "will be committed to peace." He appealed directly to Abbas "to come back to the negotiating table."

On domestic matters, he vowed to create more jobs, equalize "the burden" – an apparent reference to drafting haredi Israelis – "without tearing our people apart," cut the cost of living and push for a more stable electoral system. He appealed for help from the various parties to build "a wide national unity government – as wide and stable as possible."

Therefore, he called upon "even those who have announced that they won't sit in the government to think again – to work together for the good of the people."

Israel, he said, does not have "the luxury of being divided... So many outside forces are trying to divide us... We have to put marginal interests to the side." His goal, he said, would be to foster peace within and without, and ensure security for the nation. "It is in that spirit that I accept this mission," he said.

Peres, inviting Netanyahu to form a new coalition, said Israel "needs a new government as soon as possible." He said that the party representatives with whom he met last Wednesday and Thursday had highlighted a number of issues for the new government to address urgently. These included tackling the deficit, bolstering social justice, fighting against racism, equalizing the burden on Israelis, dealing with service in the Israel Defence Forces, reviving peace efforts and facing Israel's security challenges, Peres said.

He said he hoped the coalition negotiations would be completed quickly so that the new government could "roll up its sleeves" and get to work.

Netanyahu will have 28 days to complete the political wheeling and dealing needed to form a coalition. If he is unable to do so in the allotted time, the president can give him a 14-day extension.

The parties that recommended Netanyahu continue as prime minister were his own Likud-Beiteinu (which won 31 seats in the Jan. 22 elections), Yesh Atid (19 seats), Jewish Home (12 seats), Shas (11), United Torah Judaism (7) and Kadima (2) – for a total of 82 endorsements.

Tiny Israel a space power, conference shows

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Israel may be a tiny nation but it has a lot to offer the international space field.

That was the main message to come out of the eighth annual Ilan Ramon Space Conference in Herzliya at the end of January, which drew a record 14 heads of space agencies as well as experts from around the world, including NASA and the European Space Agency.

"Israel belongs to an exclusive club of about 10 countries in the world that have all capabilities in space – producing satellites, launching them and communicating with them," Daniel Hershkowitz, Israel's minister of science and technology, told The CJN. "We are small, but Israel is a power in space research."

Hershkowitz said Israel's importance in the field was highlighted at the conference, where participants included current NASA administrator Charles Bolden, the heads of space agencies in France, Brazil and Italy, deputy heads of agencies from Canada and Russia, a senior representative from China, and representatives from several top companies.

Israel's space industry specializes in specific areas, including miniaturization and communication technologies.

And though the Israel Space Agency's budget is all but insignificant compared to that of NASA, it is a sought-after collaboration partner.

"Israel is one of the anchors of co-operation with NASA, along with several other countries. We will consider expansion of co-operation on other applications in space exploration and development of integrated technologies" Bolden told the conference.

"The entrepreneurial spirit of the Israeli people is so overwhelmingly strong," former NASA administrator Sean O'Keefe told the Media Line Mideast news service. "You have honed the idea of using whatever you have to respond to the situation."

The meeting in Israel also recalled the 10th anniversary of the Columbia shuttle disaster, in which Israel's first astronaut, Ilan Ramon, was killed.

"This conference commemorates the amazing life of Ilan Ramon by fostering co-operation among nations," Bolden told the attendees. "The word 'shalom' is not simply 'peace,' but wholeness and completeness. Ilan and the whole crew brought us wholeness, even though they are no longer here. It's up to all of us to build on their legacy."

And though the schedule had many workshops on the latest developments in the field, space agency heads and astronauts took time to meet with the next generation of space explorers.

Bolden attended the opening of Israel's new educational Moona Science, Environment and Space Center in Sakhnin, which is being dubbed as a new opportunity to further Arab-Jewish coexistence.

"A space shuttle successfully connects between 14 astronauts from around the world, no matter what culture, religion, race, gender or nationality they are," Bolden told students at the opening of the centre. "They all connect, which means that we can also do that on the ground, and in this way, you can act and succeed."

Bolden and U.S. astronaut Randy Bresnik also judged an exhibition of solar system models built by Jerusalem-area high school students.

"Israel has a strong human resource. But human resource is not something you find at age 25. It's something you invest in from birth. Exposing children at an early age to the magic of science is extremely important," Hershkowitz told The CJN.

Space IL, a non-profit organization established by a multidisciplinary team of Israeli space enthusiasts to compete for the $30-million Google Lunar X Prize, was also at the conference. Google's challenge calls for a team to successfully launch, fly and land a robotic spacecraft on the Moon. Yariv Bash, a co-founder of the Israeli team, said it was important that NASA leaders took time to talk to the school children.

"They are the future of Israel," he said. "Space IL is aimed at the young generation. We are trying to ignite the imagination of the country's young generation and push ingenuity past its limits. We want to stimulate the young to take an interest in space exploration."

Bolden said at the conference he is sure Israel will eventually produce another astronaut.

The Science and Technology Ministry put out a statement that said it is looking seriously into the option of training another Israeli to become an astronaut in the tradition of the late Col. Ilan Ramon. The Israel Space Agency is making informal contacts with international space authorities on the matter. Although NASA has halted the dispatching of manned space shuttles into space, it may be that an Israeli trained by NASA could be sent to work at the International Space Station in a few years, the ministry said.

Israel's water

The Sea of Galilee has already collected enough water to reach its average yearly total, with more than 330 days left to round out the total.

Thanks to the heaviest winter rains Israel has seen in decades last month, the lake hit the 1.57-metre mark late last month – the average yearly intake – raising it to 210.84 metres below sea level, the highest it's been since 2006, and only two metres below the level at which water would have to be let out.

The technological advances, together with the wet weather, have led the Water Authority to nix its water conservation campaign after running it for years.

"You can now shower alone," Sofer joked, though he added that wise use of water is always sound policy.

Unfortunately for the public, being water wealthy hasn't yet translated to cheaper prices. Desalination is expensive, and on Jan. 1 the price of water increased by three per cent for the first 3.5 cubic meters per person in the household, bringing it to 9.09 shekels ($2.43).

Beyond the allocated 3.5 cubic metres, water costs 14.60 shekels per cubic meter. The price increases adds up to a 36 per cent increase since 2010.

Israeli army chief in Washington amid Syria crisis

Time of Israel Staff
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel's army chief arrived in the United States Sunday for talks with his American counterpart, amid tension with Syria following a reported Israel airstrike there last week. He arrived as Israel's defence minister insisted that Israel "means what it says" about preventing advanced weaponry being moved into Lebanon as Bashar Assad's regime in Damascus loses control.

IDF chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz began a five-day work visit as the guest of the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, the IDF said Sunday.

It said Gantz and Dempsey would hold "a series of work meetings together" and with other U.S. officials, and would "discuss current security challenges, the regional security status in the Middle East and military co-operation."

Apart from the Syria crisis, the two military chiefs will likely also focus on Iran's nuclear weapons drive. Formally starting the process of building his new government on Saturday night, Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said stopping Iran would be his first priority. Late last summer, amid reports Netanyahu wanted to launch military action against Iran, Dempsey publicly and dramatically declared that he would not want to be "complicit" in any such Israeli action.

Israel's reported airstrike Jan. 29 is said to have targeted a convoy carrying advanced anti-aircraft defence systems toward Lebanon, presumably to Hezbollah. Syria said the IAF hit a scientific research centre in Jamarya, northwest of Damascus, and on Feb. 2, it released purported video footage of the scene. Other reports indicated more sites were targeted, including a biological weapons research centre.

A Time magazine article last week said Washington has given Israel a "green light" for more such raids if it deems them necessary. It said the United States was prepared to carry out raids of its own in the Aleppo area if it feared rebels might otherwise gain control of weapons of mass destruction in that part of Syria.

On. Jan. 30, U.S. officials told the New York Times that Israel notified the United States in advance about the airstrike it carried out. An unnamed western official told the Wall Street Journal that the convoy was carrying sophisticated Russian-made SA-17 anti-aircraft weapons, which could constitute a strategic game-changer were Hezbollah to possess them.

Israel hasn't confirmed the Jan. 29 air raid, but Defence Minister Ehud Barak hinted Sunday at Israel's involvement.

Speaking at a security conference in Munich, Barak said, "What happened in Syria several days ago... that's proof that when we said something we mean it — we say that we don't think it should be allowed to bring advanced weapons systems into Lebanon," he said.

Barak said he believes Assad's fall is imminent and would be a major blow to Iran and Hezbollah. He said that "Hezbollah from Lebanon and the Iranians are the only allies that Assad has left."

Assad responded to the Israeli strike for the first time on Sunday while speaking with Iranian envoy Saeed Jalili in Damascus. He said that Israel's aggression "exposes the true role conducted by Israel in collaboration with the external forces hostile [to Syria] in destabilizing security in Syria and weakening it so that it forgoes its national principles."

Meanwhile, Iran last week threatened "grave consequences for Tel Aviv" after the airstrike.

And on Sunday, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan of Turkey, a traditional foe of Assad, said the raid was illegal according to international law.

"Anything could happen in the region," he told reporters in Istanbul. "Those who treated the Israeli government like a spoiled child should know that history will not forgive Israel's state structure."

The previous day, Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu blasted Assad for his non-response to the alleged Israeli air raid. "Why didn't Assad even throw a pebble when Israeli jets were flying over his palace and playing with the dignity of his country?" he asked reporters.

Davutoglu suggested Assad was conspiring with Israel. "Is there a secret agreement between Assad and Israel?... Why don't you use the same power that you use against defenceless women against Israel, which you have seen as an enemy since its foundation," he said.

On Feb. 1, Russia issued a statement condemning the "unprovoked" attack on the territory of a sovereign country, "no matter the motives to justify it," while Egyptian Foreign Minister Mohammed Amr said his country condemned the "illegal attack" on Arab soil and urged the international community to do so as well.

And the Arab League, which has been harshly critical of Assad, also rebuked Israel, calling the bombing a "glaring violation" of an Arab country's sovereignty.

Fischer to leave bank early

Stanley Fischer is stepping down from his position as governor of the Bank of Israel. Fischer, 69, will leave office June 30 after serving eight years that included shepherding the Israeli economy through the global financial crisis of 2007-08. His term was scheduled to end in 2015. In 2010, Fischer was named the world's best bank governor. After the global economic woes of 2007-08, in September 2009, the bank became the first in the developed world to raise interest rates. Fischer became an Israeli citizen when he assumed his position. He's known for his American-accented, but nearly flawless, Hebrew. He previously served as chief economist at the World Bank. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Fischer played a major role in Israel's economic growth and in the achievements of its economy.

Tax transfers resume

Israel has resumed transferring tax money to the Palestinian Authority that it collected on behalf of the PA. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reportedly decided to transfer all the money withheld from December because of the PA's serious financial problems. Tax money collected for the PA from November, reportedly about $115 million, was transferred to the Israel Electric Corp. to cover part of the PA's debt to the utility. The money freeze came after the United Nations General Assembly voted on Nov. 29 to upgrade the Palestinian's UN status to non-member state observer against Israel's wishes. Israel collects income tax from Palestinians working in Israel, as well as import duties for the PA.

Warsaw Ghetto uprising's 70th anniversary

Moshe Phillips
JNS.org

Seventy years ago last month, the Nazis began their second deportation of the Jews from the Warsaw Ghetto.

In response, on Jan. 18, 1943, the first organized and armed Jewish/Zionist resistance action in the ghetto was launched. The fighters of the ZZW and ZOB drove the Nazis from the ghetto.

Comment

Months later, on April 19, 1943, on the eve of Passover, the Nazi SS and police units entered the ghetto and were attacked by organized Jewish partisans yet again.

There were two separate armed resistance organizations in the ghetto – the ZZW and ZOB. The most famous Jewish leader of armed resistance is Mordechai Anielewicz, commander of the ZOB (Jewish Fighting Organization) during the uprising. The ZOB was an alliance of several Zionist and non-Zionist youth groups. Anielewicz received paramilitary training in Betar as a young teenager and left the group before the war. The ZOB had a socialist orientation, and Betar as an organization did not participate in it, in part because of politics.

ZZW, the Jewish Military Organization, was commanded and manned by Betar members and their allies. Betar's fighters in the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising have been largely written out of history. Moshe Arens, a former Israeli defence minister who was a Betar member, recently wrote a yet-to-be published book on Betar's heroic battle against the SS in the ghetto. That book, Flags Over the Warsaw Ghetto (Gefen Publishing, November 2011), and articles by Arens about the ZZW that were published in Yad Vashem Studies, Ha'aretz and the Jerusalem Post have helped to create a far more accurate account of the ZZW's participation in the uprising. The book and the articles also did much to recall the heroism of Pawel Frenkel, ZZW's commander.

The ZZW is now thought by historians to have been the better-equipped force in the ghetto, as it had procured machine guns. The ZOB, however, had more fighters.

The groups finally decided to co-ordinate their efforts in the last moments before the April 19 battle began. For 28 days, Jewish warriors fought the enemy and showed bravery not seen since the days of Bar Kochba's uprising against Rome.

In the Vilna Ghetto, Betar leader Joseph Glazman was deputy commander of the United Partisan Organization, the only armed Jewish resistance group in that ghetto.

Betar was founded in 1923 by Ze'ev Jabotinsky (1880-1940), a figure who is too often forgotten today. Professor Daniel J. Elazar (1934-1999), a scholar of the Jewish political tradition, in the May 15, 1981, edition of the journal Sh'ma Elazar remarked about Jabotinsky's legacy:

"Would there be serious public commemoration of the 100th birthday of Zev Jabotinsky had it not been for the fact that the Likud won the election in Israel in 1977? Not likely. For 30 years and more, Jabotinsky was one of those non-persons in Israel and the Jewish world... The ruling Labor party made him a non-person for the same reasons that it portrayed [then-prime minister] Menachem Begin and his supporters as uncivilized fascists – it is easier to beat the opposition by painting it as irrelevant, intolerable and non-existent, until it is too strong to be dismissed."

This year's 70th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising offers an opportunity to remind today's Jews about Jabotinsky's vital contributions.

Former NYC mayor Ed Koch dies at 88

Ron Kampeas
JTA

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Ed Koch, the pugnacious former New York City mayor whose political imprimatur was eagerly sought by Republicans and Democrats alike, has died.

Koch, 88, died early last Friday morning of congestive heart failure, his spokesperson told the New York Times. He had been hospitalized twice in recent weeks to drain fluid from his lungs.

Famous for greeting constituents with "How'm I doing?" the Jewish mayor presided over some of the city's most difficult years, from 1978 to 1989, and helped spur the recovery that would flourish under one of his successors, Rudy Giuliani.

Koch's third term was mired by corruption scandals and burgeoning racial tensions, and after losing his bid for election to a fourth term in 1989, Koch retired into a happy existence as a Jewish Yoda, blessing or cursing political penitents as he saw fit, and not always hewing to the prescripts of his Democratic Party.

In 1990, on a visit to Jerusalem during the first intifadah, Koch was struck by a rock in the head. He was barely nicked, mopping up his wound with a handkerchief, but the incident became one of Koch's proudest moments, he often said. "I shed a little blood for the people of Israel," he would recall.

Koch never met a solicitation for an opinion that he didn't like. He endorsed Giuliani, a Republican, in his successful 1993 bid to defeat David Dinkins, who had defeated Koch four years earlier, and went on to share – and sometimes take over – the stage at endorsements for other Republicans, including New York governor George Pataki, senator Al D'Amato and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

The measure of the warmth both parties felt for him was reflected last week by statements from their Jewish affiliates.

"Mayor Koch was a passionate and principled leader and an outspoken defender of Israel and the Jewish community," Matt Brooks, the Republican Jewish Coalition director, said in a statement. "He chose principle over politics and didn't engage in partisan bitterness."

The National Jewish Democratic Council statement underscored that whatever his past peregrinations, Koch worked to elect and then re-elect President Barack Obama.

"Koch was a consummate and proud Jewish Democrat who advocated fiercely for the U.S.-Israel relationship and the progressive domestic policies in which he truly believed," a statement said.

Egyptian official says Holocaust was a 'myth'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A senior Egyptian official close to President Mohamed Morsi suggested the Holocaust was a myth invented by U.S. intelligence agencies to discredit their Nazi foes.

Fathi Shihab-Eddim, who is responsible for appointing editors to state-run newspapers, said, "The myth of the Holocaust is an industry that America invented."

He went on to claim the Holocaust was used "to justify war and massive destruction against military and civilian facilities of the Axis powers and especially to hit Hiroshima and Nagasaki with the atomic bomb."

Shihab-Eddim's comments came as the world marked International Holocaust Remembrance Day, which coincides with the liberation of the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp by Soviet forces.

The remarks also came about two weeks after a 2010 video was released in which Morsi, then head of the Muslim Brotherhood, called Jews "the descendants of apes and pigs."

The Muslim Brotherhood has long been criticized for bigotry: the new Egyptian constitution prohibits Copts (Christians) from becoming president and it withholds religious rights from Ba'hai's and Shiites.

"I can't say I'm surprised," said Nazi-hunter Efraim Zuroff in Jerusalem. "These views are very prevalent in the Arab world. The fact a person of his stature – an adviser to Morsi who chooses the people for state-run media outlets – [made them] is very dangerous."

"The worst kind of Holocaust-denial is government-sponsored Holocaust-denial. In other words, the leadership of the country is telling you the Holocaust never took place," he said.

Zuroff contrasted western democracies, where only individuals on the fringes of society with no influence promote Holocaust denial, and the Arab world. The Muslim Brotherhood, he continued, "is incredibly ignorant and stupid when it comes to the history of World War II and the Jews."

He called on western governments, including Canada, to protest the Morsi remarks and those that deny the Holocaust.

If similar statements were made by western leaders, there would be a protest. "They're not holding them to the same standards as [expected] in the western world," he said.

Canadian business school deans visit Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Peggy Cunningham didn't waste much time before briefing members of Dalhousie University's business school about her trip to Israel.

Cunningham, dean of the Rowe School of Business, told her colleagues and others at the Halifax university that Israel earned its reputation as "startup nation" through entrepreneurship and in part, by the quality of its research institutions.

She suggested Israeli successes in innovation and high-tech companies could be studied and applied in Nova Scotia. And in an email exchange with The CJN, she said Nova Scotia and Israel have much to learn from each other.

Cunningham was part of a group of 11 deans of Canadian business schools who visited Israel recently under the auspices of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa. Business schools at the University of Ottawa, McGill, the University of Manitoba, the University of Calgary, Simon Fraser University and Ryerson and Memorial universities were among those represented.

They were accompanied by Dylan Hanley, CIJA's associate director of university studies.

Prior to her departure for Israel, Cunningham said she was "more aware of Israel's political issues than its business climate. Thus the visit totally changed my views. Learning about Israel's success with regard to high-tech innovation was very powerful, but it was also valuable for me to see the complexity of the business environment, from small family businesses to large international businesses."

In briefing notes she distributed at the university, Cunningham pointed out Israel ranks third in the world for entrepreneurship and produces more than 4,000 high-tech startups. "It is number 1 with regard to the quality of its research institutions. It has 18 per cent of all life-science patents in the world, and it is number 1 in terms of patents for medical devices. It has also outpaced the world with regard to job creation, surpassing the European Union, Brazil and China. Exports make up 40 per cent of its economy."

Surveying the academic scene, Cunningham noted students generally attend following military service and are more mature than their Canadian counterparts. She suggested three Israeli universities – the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, the University of Tel Aviv and Ben-Gurion University, are seeking international students.

"I am going to further explore the idea of offering a tour for top achieving students from our four schools. We learned a lot on our tour, and students would, too. Many of the entrepreneurship programs we saw were the result of close collaboration between business and government. Israel focuses on information technology and knowledge management. There is a growing focus on 'clean tech,' water conservation and realization there is a requirement to think about environmental and social sustainability. Thus, such a trip would provide a rich learning venue for [our] students."

Cunningham suggested other exchanges could include hosting Israeli academics as visiting scholars. "We have invited Dov Zohar from the Technion to be a visiting scholar, and would welcome others as well," she said.

"We are creating a new program for top performing students who will be able to compete to go on a trip similar to the one we went on, with some course work taken at Israel universities," she also stated.

That's the kind of result that CIJA was banking on. "In the last few years, our strategy has been to work on bridge-building between Canadian and Israeli universities," said Hanley.

Much of the discourse on campuses has been hijacked by "a small number of angry anti-Israel voices... We're taking the high road. This is about collaboration and bridge-building in areas that are natural."

Israel is well-known for its innovation in high tech, medical devices, environmental solutions and renewable energy, said Hanley. For their part, Canadian business schools are among the best in the world.

"We're hoping to see exchange agreements, programs, academic collaboration, study tours and studying abroad," Hanley said.

In a statement, the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa, said, "One of our goals at the embassy is to expose [Israel's] success story to Canada's business, political, cultural and academic communities.

"Our hope is to build partnerships in the areas of innovation and entrepreneurialism between Canadian and Israeli institutions that will have a long-term impact, mutually benefiting the citizens of both countries."

Israelis are well-known for spawning innovative new businesses in high tech; Canadians have expertise in energy and resource management. Perhaps these are areas where exchanges could results, Hanley suggested.

So far, CIJA has been happy with the feedback from the participants. For her part, Cunningham went hoping "to learn more about the universities, areas for potential partnerships and entrepreneurial success. My expectations were exceeded," she said.

Israel, Palestinians co-operate on water issues

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — While politicians in Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) continue their on again/off again posturing and peacemaking, some facts on the ground are bringing Israelis and Palestinians closer together – notably when it comes to environmental issues.

Quietly, Israel and the PA have been co-operating extensively to preserve the environment of the entire landmass west of the Jordan River, according to a top water engineer from a large Palestinian-controlled city in the West Bank. The PA needs and wants Israel's help in keeping water clean, expanding agricultural opportunities for farmers, and ensuring safe disposal of waste and trash, the engineer said.

Attending the 17th annual International Cleantech Business Forum along with about a dozen other PA engineers and municipal officials, "Amar" (who asked that his real name and employer's name not be used) said everyone in the PA, without exception, had nothing but admiration for Israel's accomplishments in technology, especially water and agricultural tech.

"We want and need the advanced systems that Israel has developed to preserve the environment and to enhance agricultural output. We are neighbours, and we share the same environment, so it is to both our advantages that we co-operate on these issues."

Far from the limelight, Amar said, Israel and the PA have developed numerous joint projects to tackle environmental problems. "For example, this June a new sewage treatment facility in Emek Hefer will come on line, which will be connected to sewage flow from Tulkarm, Jenin, and other West Bank towns."

The project is actually the completion of a longstanding effort by officials on both sides of the Green Line to do something about wastewater from PA cities that had for years choked and threatened to destroy the Alexander River, which flows near Netanya. The project required extensive co-operation between Israel and the PA, with contractors building cesspools, pipes and other infrastructure. "Even during the wars (in 2002-2003, and last year), the co-operation continued," Amar said. The more, and higher quality, water available, the more West Bank farmers will be able to plant, and the higher their incomes and living standards will be. "That's good for everyone as well," he added.

Uzi Landau

Amar's comments presaged those of outgoing Water and Energy Minister Uzi Landau, who spoke a few minutes later at a symposium on water and energy.

"Our neighbours are in great need," Landau said, citing the severe and chronic water shortage in Jordan, and the long-standing erosion of water resources in Syria that has forced many farmers off their land. "Water in the Middle East is becoming scarce, even more scarce than oil."

While the water situation around Israel deteriorates, Israel, said Landau, has found the solution to its own water problems and is ready and willing to export its knowledge and experience to anyone who seeks it, including its longtime enemies. "Within a few years, there will be a 70 per cent to 80 per cent chance that the water coming out of your tap will be desalinated."

Thanks to technology, Landau said, "Israel's water supply is now stable."

Already, Landau said, about a quarter of Israel's water economy is based on desalinated water, a figure that will reach 50 per cent within two years. The goal is to raise that to 75 per cent by 2020.

But desalination isn't the only area Israel excels in. "Already 75 per cent of the water supplied to agriculture comes from recycled sewage and waste water. According to the UN, which has declared 2013 the Year of Water, there is no 'wastewater,' only water that has not been recovered. The UN has called on nations around the world to aim for a 50 per cent recovery rate of wastewater by 2025. In Israel, we have a 95 per cent recovery rate."

Israeli companies, concluded Landau, are world leaders in desalination and sewage recycling. "And if our neighbours choose to seek our help, we will gladly provide it," he added.

For Amar, that invitation is nothing new. "We are just as interested in preserving water resources and having a clean environment as Israel, and we have done our share to preserve resources as well."

For example, Amar said, the PA has stopped drawing water from the badly depleted Jordan River, even though it is entitled to a share, along with Jordan, according to the Oslo accords. Instead, Israel has been compensating the PA with water from the National Water Carrier, which draws from the Kinneret, the coastal aquifer and, increasingly, from desalination plants. "Co-operation in these areas is good, and we have respectful relations with our Israeli colleagues on the basis of a common concern. Personally, I have no use for politicians, and I don't trust them, neither yours nor ours," said Amar. "I trust scientists and specialists. That's why I'm at this show."

Former journalist writes children's book

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

What does a seasoned journalist and author do after leaving a career of interviewing many of the world's high-profile leaders, diplomats and decision makers?

She writes a children's book.

Montreal-born Aliza Davidovit made a career for herself working on the ABC news magazine program 20/20 with Connie Chung and as a producer at Fox News Channel. She's also written numerous profiles of celebrities and diplomats for a wide array of magazines and journals, much of it centred on Israel advocacy.

Now that she's out of the TV news game – though she still ghost-writes biographical material for many prominent personalities – her most recent effort is something much less politically weighty, though as important as any story she's ever covered: a morality tale for children called Spunky the Monkey.

Written by Davidovit and illustrated by Montreal artist Bec Eichler, the kids' bedtime book follows the exploits of a little monkey who is sick of his steady diet of bananas and longs for a pizza.

So he decides to steal one and is quickly apprehended. To say any more is to give away the plot, suffice it to say a lesson in appreciating what one has and how one's actions impact others is learned.

The book is a smorgasbord of vibrant colours and amusing drawings by Eichler's hand, and the rhyming narrative proves a fun read for children ages three to seven.

(This writer tested the book out on his own daycare- and kindergarten-aged children, to their delight.)

Reached in New York, where she is now based, Davidovit told The CJN she wanted to change her direction after tiring of the political sphere.

Working in the U.S. "ego-driven" news sphere for the past 18 years made her realize that her focus should be on children and how to influence them to make moral decisions in life.

"I don't think one can really make change [as a journalist] using words in the U.S. political realm," she said. "I realized in that world, even though I'm using my words and the full force of my talents and abilities and exposure, it's hard to make change in the world. Especially because [politicians] are so ego-driven. Congressmen or senators know the answers before I even ask my questions. It really doesn't matter what my question is. They have an agenda and throw their answers at me. I can't pierce that world.

"Like I said, everything I do is to make this world a better place and from the heart. This year I'll be ordained as a rabbi, and I carry a sefer Torah in my heart wherever I go," she said.

> Everything I do is to make this world a better place

Though she has no children of her own, Davidovit, who was married to an Orthodox rabbi for 10 years before leaving him, is a firm believer in Jewish values.

And she is an aunt to numerous family members.

"Pretty much everything I do, whether in journalism or Israel advocacy, is always [with the mission] to not just make people see the light, but to be the light. To be the proponent of good thoughts and deeds," she said.

And it all starts with youth, she said.

In order to change the future of the world – "which is going to hell in a hand basket," she said – one has to start with the children.

"You can't change prime ministers and diplomats, so I felt it was time" to try and get a message of positivity to kids, Davidovit said.

Today's adults, she said, are so busy trying to give their children the things they didn't have, they forget to give kids the things they did have.

"Which is a work ethic, a sense of values, appreciation for things... these things are lacking in today's society. There's such a sense of entitlement among children and teenagers," she said. "Boy oh boy, I'm scared for future generations if we don't change this."

Davidovit said she grew up learning a work ethic and respect for her elders because her mother worked in the nursing-home industry.

"When you look at kids today, the way they talk to their parents, never mind their grandparents... there's no respect. Where do you go from that?" she asked.

This year, she plans to go on a speaking and reading tour in promotion of Spunky the Monkey, and the first place she has targeted to launch the tour is in Montreal at United Talmud Torahs elementary school in St. Laurent.

"It will be interesting to go back there in this capacity," she said.

Davidovit plans on turning the book into a series of books and lessons for kids, using a different animal for each.

"Look, parents today are so open-minded, their brains fell out. Kids need to learn right and wrong. Black and white. You can't leave it to them to decide what's right or not," she said. "They need to hear over and over the difference between right and wrong, so that when the parent isn't around, at least their voice and lessons are still present and hakking their kops [beating them over their heads]."

Aliza Davidovit

Asked whether she plans to have the book published in Hebrew and other languages and how many copies were made in the initial print run, Davidovit demurs.

"I'm still pushing the English version, but many people have asked me whether I'll translate it into Hebrew and French and other languages. I'm considering it," she said.

As for the numbers, Davidovit won't divulge publishing statistics for fear of hurting its distribution among youth.

"In the Talmud it says, 'Whatever is counted isn't blessed.'"

David Broza serenades community

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf

Showcasing his renowned staccato picking and flamenco-infused Israeli pop style, guitarist-songwriter David Broza electrified an audience at Toronto's Sheraton Centre event venue last week.

The musical guest of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 2013 campaign closing event, Broza played a selection of his hits and poems-put-to-guitar in an intimate concert on Jan. 30.

For anyone who hasn't experienced a Broza performance, the man has a solid stage presence and can captivate a crowd both with his expert and emotive flamenco strumming techniques and his storytelling abilities.

Broza, the son of an Israeli-English businessman and folksinger mother, was born in Haifa but raised and schooled in both England and Spain from ages 12 to 18, when he retuned to Israel to serve in the army.

He began his musical career in 1977, immediately after his Israel Defence Forces service – during which time he'd started playing guitar in Israeli cafés and bars in his off-service hours to make some extra money – though he'd initially planned to become a graphic artist.

Since then, the trilingual musician has released 28 albums and received worldwide accolades. His presence has also been felt in North America, when he took up residence in New Jersey for 17 years to study American poets.

He's been called the Israeli Bruce Springsteen and a post-modern Leonard Cohen, as well as drawing comparisons from music critics to the musical stylings of Jackson Browne and Gordon Lightfoot.

On this night, the Israeli troubadour interspersed tales from his youth living abroad in Madrid – where he fell in love with flamenco music – with his love of Israel and the many collaborations he's worked on in his home country.

One story in particular shed light on some of the inner turmoil that fuels Broza's creativity. A chance meeting with one of his favourite Spanish poets, Pablo Guerrero, provided a moment of levity at the concert.

"I was back in Madrid and I booked myself a couple of shows at this bar. After one of them, an elderly man walks into my dressing room and I immediately recognized him as Guerrero. I was shocked. And instead of telling him what an honour or privilege it was to meet him, I asked him if he would consider writing with me. To which he said 'no,'" Broza recounted, the audience laughing at the foible.

But Guerrero did invite him to his home for coffee and asked Broza to tell him more about himself.

"So, maybe because he was a stranger, I began to tell him deep, dark things about myself. And I kept going. Eventually, he told me to stop and that I was depressing him," he said, eliciting more laughter from the audience.

Yet days later, Guerrero faxed him a poem based on all Broza told him. It was a dark and depressing ode, but once put to song, it became one of his greatest hits, he said.

Finishing the tale, Broza launched into it, Lloro (Amarga Es Tu Ausencia) – Cry (Bitter Is Your Absence), a haunting song that held the audience rapt.

Hit after hit emanated from the Israeli musician, culminating in a three-song finale for which he invited fellow Israeli musician and oud master Yair Dalal on stage, to perform two songs – the beautiful Bedouin Love Song and an extended jam – before inviting the JRoots Supplemental Jewish School choir to join them in a rendition of arguably his most popular song, Yihiyeh Tov (All Will Be Well), his anthem for peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

The choir, comprising children aged four to 12, stood as a group behind Broza and Dalal, smiling, and confidently chanting out the chorus and swaying to the song when prompted by the two elder musicians.

At one point, Broza, 57, looked back at the choir and told the audience how the song is a wish for the children of Israel and those of the Palestinians might one day live together in peace "under the olive trees. And that fresh new grass will grow over the graveyards in the name of love and peace.

"For after 100 years of war, we haven't and will not lose hope," he proclaimed.

With that, Broza, with Dalal conducting the choir, belted out the final refrain to the song and exhorted the kids and the crowd to sing out "Yihiyeh Tov" as he strummed furiously, before standing and taking his final bows with the children.

The choir closed the night with a rendition of Hatikvah.

FROM VIOLENCE TO VIOLINS: A concert with celebrated violinist Moshe Hammer and pianist Ross Inglis to raise funds for a music program entitled "From Violence to Violins" for 350 at-risk youths in 18 Toronto schools aroused standing ovations from over 200 guests at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation recently. The program, which included the music of Mozart, Kriesler, Bruch and Sarasate, also paid tribute to Toronto pianist and popular band leader, Leo Spellman, who composed Rhapsody 1939-1945, internationally acclaimed as one of the most searing and soaring musical testimonials to the Holocaust. The audience was rapt as Hammer played a moving Spellman piece entitled Mood. [Brian Cantor photo]

Tarragon presents a Moscovitch double bill

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Hannah Moscovitch's play Other People's Children, part of a Moscovitch double bill coming to Toronto's Tarragon Theatre, is about an upwardly mobile couple that hires a Sri Lankan live-in nanny for their 10-year-old daughter.

Paul Lampert, the co-director of Other People's Children, said that it's a "very modern look at what happens when we have someone take care of our children, when we make the choice that we have to get back to work."

In the play, the husband, Ben, is not crazy about the nanny, Sati, coming into the house because he's more of a traditionalist who would like his wife, Ilana, to form a stronger bond with their daughter.

"Very quickly it turns out that Sati is not only an excellent nanny, but she has three children of her own back in Sri Lanka... she's an excellent mother," Lampert said. "She's able to cope well."

Ilana, who is played by Lampert's wife and co-director, Nikki Landau, begins to feel insecure about her own motherhood and her mothering qualities, and Ben starts to like Sati's mothering qualities. The difficulties arise as the relationships develop, Lampert said.

"Inevitably there are going to be people in the audience with children who have nannies, and they are going to be asking themselves similar kinds of questions of how good a parent they are and how much is this person I'm bringing into the house becoming part of my family," said Lampert, the father of a daughter, Clara, 5.

"It is interesting because we are really speaking to this socioeconomic bracket that would very much understand these issues."

The play also looks at the nanny's situation – she has left her children behind to be raised by someone else, perhaps a relative, to take care of other people's children, Lampert said. The relative is forming bonds that are more ingrained and tighter with "other people's children."

Gray Powell plays Ilana's husband, Ben, and Elisa Moolecherry, a Canadian who is the artistic director of BeMe Theatre in Munich, plays the nanny, Sati.

As a co-director, Lampert said the challenge for him is that Moscovitch writes "in a very particular fashion and yet none of the text is upfront. It is all sub-textual, so you really have to work with the actors very closely to find what is going on underneath the text and you have to navigate that.

"Luckily, Hannah is occasionally in the room and I can actually ask her what she was looking for. Hannah writes in an almost cryptic fashion and what is said is deeply buried with intention and motivation. The language is a façade... only a mask for what is really going on underneath."

Paul Lampert

Lampert said that Moscovitch is a "fascinating playwright who is quickly becoming one of the most important playwrights currently in Canada."

Although this is the first time Lampert, a National Theatre School of Canada graduate, has directed a play by Moscovitch, Lampert's list of credits is extensive, including working with Poland's Teatr BLIK, and International Theatre in Vienna. He directed the national première of Oleanna for the Stary Theatre in Kraków, Poland, and I, Claudia, for BeMe Theatre, which toured to Barcelona, Shanghai and Munich.

Lampert has directed at theatres across Canada, including at the Blyth Festival and Shaw Festival. He's the past artistic director of Toronto's George Brown Theatre School and is now on sabbatical from teaching acting and directing at York University.

Other People's Children is on a bill with Little One, directed by Natasha Mytnowych.

Lampert and Landau are the co-artistic directors of Theatre PANIK.

Hannah Moscovitch's Other People's Children is presented in co-production with Theatre PANIK at Tarragon Theatre's Extra Space from Feb. 14 to March 24. For tickets, call the box office at 416-531-1827 or visit www.tarragontheatre.com.

COMPOSER JOHN WEINZWEIG HONOURED ON THE CENTENNIAL OF HIS BIRTH

The late composer John Weinzweig, who would have turned 100 years old in March, is being remembered with a weekend of free musical events at the University of Toronto's Faculty of Music to be followed by a yearlong series of events across Canada.

Weinzweig is being honoured for his musical innovation, his passionate mentorship of students such as R. Murray Schafer and Harry Somers, his energetic advocacy for Canadian music, and his legacy as a founder of the Canadian League of Composers and Canadian Music Centre.

A free evening of music curated by Soundstreams artistic director Lawrence Cherney features the combined talents of conductor Victor Feldbrill, pianist Serouj Kradjian, soprano Shannon Mercer, flutist Robert Aitken, harpist Judy Loman, bassoonist Bianca Chambul, double bassist James Van Demark and the Guelph Chamber Choir. Walter Hall, Edward Johnson Building, 80 Queen's Park. March 8, 8 p.m.

A day of free lectures and lecture-recitals exploring Weinzweig's influence and contemporaries is offered on March 9, and the Cecilia String Quartet perform a free lunchtime performance on March 11. Also on that day, a commemorative plaque for the former Weinzweig family home is set to be unveiled as part of the City of Toronto's Legacy Project. For more details, visit www.johnweinzweig.com.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Hezbollah, Hamas are Israel's chief military foes

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A generation ago, Israel's battlefield adversaries were primarily the Arab armies of Egypt and Syria, both of which fought a succession of wars with Israel from 1948 onward. Since then, the irregular forces of Hezbollah and Hamas, based in Lebanon and the Gaza Strip and backed by Iran and Syria, have been Israel's chief military foes.

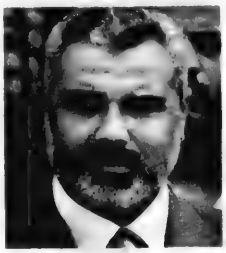
Hezbollah, otherwise known as the Party of God, engaged Israel in a bruising war of attrition in southern Lebanon in the 1980s and 1990s. These battles did not end until Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon in May 2000. The next round of fighting took place in the summer of 2006, when Hezbollah, touched off a month-long war after killing and kidnapping several Israeli soldiers in the northern Galilee.

Hamas, which emerged during the first Palestinian uprising, terrorized Israelis by means of suicide bombings starting in 1994. Israel responded with a campaign of bombings and targeted assassinations of its leaders. Beginning in 2001, Hamas began firing rockets at Israel, triggering a succession of skirmishes and border wars in 2008-09 and 2012.

Clearly, as Joshua L. Gleis and Benedetta Berti argue in Hezbollah and Hamas: A Comparative Study (Johns Hopkins University Press), a first-rate account of their respective development, Hezbollah and Hamas have evolved into important players in the Arab-Israeli conflict, and will continue to play this role in the future.

Founded in 1982, following Israel's invasion of Lebanon, Hezbollah is a multi-faceted Islamic fundamentalist Shiite organization – a political party, a socio-religious movement and a terrorist group.

Although Israel's postwar occupation of southern Lebanon was a key factor in its emergence, at least two other factors accounted for its formation, the co-authors contend. Hezbollah capitalized on Shiite grievances of being treated like second-class citizens in comparison to Sunni Muslims and Christians. As well, Hezbollah was inspired by the Islamic revolution in Iran.



Ismail Haniyeh

"For Iran, having a proxy force in Lebanon allowed it to attack Israel, have a hand in the Arab-Israeli peace process (which it opposed) and expand Shiite influence in the Arab world," write Gleis and Berti.

Syria, too, used Hezbollah as a surrogate in its struggle with Israel. But because the non-sectarian Syrian regime feared that Hezbollah might use its influence to Islamize the Lebanese Shiite community, Syria tried to keep Hezbollah in check by supporting its secular rival, Amal, from which much of Hezbollah's leadership was tapped. Syria's relationship with Hezbollah improved only after 2000, the co-authors note.

From the moment of its establishment, Hezbollah was committed to three objectives: expelling foreign armies – mainly American and French – from Lebanese soil, setting up an Islamic government in Lebanon and wiping Israel off the face of the Earth.

The co-authors claim that Hezbollah thrives on conflict: "Hezbollah's core raison d'être lies in its 'resistance' agenda with respect to Israel... It needs an ongoing confrontation with the Jewish state to maintain both external legitimacy and a wide supportive base."

Hezbollah, given its belief that Israel is an illegitimate and illegal entity, claims that all acts of "resistance" against the Jewish state cannot be considered terrorism. As the co-authors contend, Hamas makes a self-serving distinction between "martyrdom" operations, which are permitted under Islam, and suicide bombings, which are not allowed.

Hezbollah is far more than an anti-Zionist organization, exhibiting "a rabid streak of antisemitism," Gleis and Berti point out.

Hassan Nasrallah, its secretary-general, has been quoted as saying, "If we searched the entire world for a person more cowardly, despicable, weak and feeble in psyche, mind, ideology and religion, we would not find anyone like the Jew. Notice I did not say the Israeli."

Hassan Nasrallah

Hezbollah also engages in Holocaust denial, placing itself on the same level as neo-Nazis.

Prior to the Second Lebanon War in 2006, Hezbollah fired Katyusha rockets at Israel and launched guerrilla warfare against the Israeli army in Israel's self-declared security zone.

With Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon, the rules of the game changed as Hezbollah shifted the majority of its attacks to the disputed Shebaa Farms region, taken by Israel from Syria in the Six Day War and now claimed by the Lebanese government.

During the early 1990s, Hezbollah moved its operations abroad, bombing the Israeli Embassy and the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires, supposedly with Iran's assistance.

In the past few years, however, Hezbollah has largely refrained from attacking Israel. Israeli deterrence has worked, but will probably not last indefinitely. As Gleis and Berti observe, Hezbollah has been rearming at "a feverish pace," and the day will come when it will throw caution to the wind and try to provoke an incident that will embroil it in battle with Israel yet again.

Like Hezbollah, Hamas is Islamic to the core, having emerged from the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. But Hamas is fundamentally a product of violence, having been formed on the anvil of the first Palestinian uprising in 1987.

Not surprisingly, Hamas, like most Palestinian Islamic groups, was influenced by Iran. As Gleis and Berti write, "The [Iranian] revolution provided proof that the Islamists could use the power and ideology of jihad to bring about real change... and wage jihad against Israel."

From the outset, bilateral relations between Hamas and Fatah – the mainstream Palestinian organization founded by Yasser Arafat in the mid-1950s – have been characterized by competition and reciprocal distrust. No such tension appears to have sullied Hamas' relationship with Hezbollah.

After having trounced Fatah in the Gaza Strip's municipal elections in 2005, Hamas won the legislative elections there in 2006, and Ismail Haniyeh was installed as prime minister.

Fatah lost the last election because it was mired in a culture of endemic corruption and was discredited by its failure to deliver services effectively and end Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. Gleis and Berti explain.

Although Hamas is pragmatically amenable to signing a long-term truce with Israel, within the context of a two-state solution, it accepts neither Israel's existence nor its legitimacy. According to Hamas, Israel exists on territory deemed to belong to a Muslim religious trust.

Hamas, like Hezbollah, has grown increasingly sophisticated militarily. In last November's eight-day border war, Hamas rockets reached the outskirts of Jerusalem and Tel Aviv without causing death and destruction, shot down by Israel's Iron Dome anti-missile system or landing in open fields or in the sea. Although the rockets caused no harm, their range shocked some Israelis.

Politically, Hamas has been effective in Islamizing the Arab-Israeli dispute, the authors add. This, too, is a disquieting trend.

Soo's Schiller developing into tough guy to play against

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Landon Schiller refused to take "no" for an answer – and in the long run, it got him the result he was looking for.

Last year, the Thornhill native attended the Sault Ste. Marie Greyhounds' camp, but didn't make the cut. It was back to major midget for him, where he suited up for the Toronto Junior Canadiens.

He didn't mope or pout. Instead, he worked on his game, developing the foot speed and strength he'd need if he wanted to play in the OHL.

Last summer he worked out at the BodySmith gym in Stouffville, along with lots of other OHL players and prospects, following an exercise regimen specifically designed for hockey players.

This season, his efforts paid off: he cracked the starting lineup of the Greyhounds as a 17-year-old right winger.

Schiller recently turned 18 and, after serving a 10-game suspension, he's getting back in the groove with the 'Hounds.

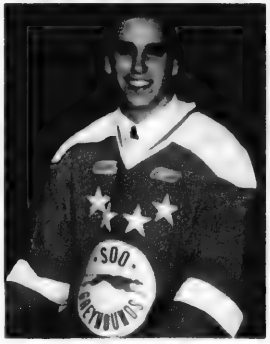
"I always had faith. It was a matter of making it happen," he said.

So far this season, with limited ice time, he's scored one goal, but he has 43 minutes in penalties to go along with it. His stats suggest he's got a lot more to give. As a 16-year-old with the Markham Majors, he scored 14 goals and added 21 assists in 52 games. He appeared in the GTHL all-star game in 2012

He admits coming from major midget to junior hockey was "a huge jump. The hockey is a lot faster, the guys here are a lot stronger."

"At first it was tough, but with all the practising and trying to find where you fit, the guys helped me make the jump," he said. "It's difficult, but it's good, because the guys are welcoming. It's like a family."

Schiller counts Brad Marchand of the Boston Bruins, Mike Richards of the Los Angeles Kings and Jarome Iginla of the Calgary Flames as his favourite NHL players and role models. What he likes about them is that they'll do just about anything to help their team win.



Landon Schiller
(James Egan Photography)

"I work really hard," he said, in evaluating his game. "I'll compete every shift, put pucks on the net, do the little things right."

"To a certain degree [Schiller] is finding his way, what role he's going to fill in the future," said Greyhounds head coach Sheldon Keefe.

Schiller is "an energy guy, versatile who can play all [forward] positions. He's just a very hard-working and respectful player who's eager to contribute to the team. Those are the kinds of guys who are easy to have around," Keefe said.

So far this season, Schiller has played mostly a fourth line, limited-minutes role, but he's moved up when injuries or suspensions hit the team.

The Greyhounds see Schiller's contributions increasing as he grows and gets more mature. He has a well-rounded skill set, including a good shot.

"We believe he'll turn into a nice, all-around player who won't be easy to play against," Keefe said.

Since arriving in Sault Ste. Marie, Schiller has continued to work on his defensive game, killing penalties and developing a more "explosive" first step.

He's also adjusting to life far from home. He's been billeted with a local family and is enrolled in school, where he's finishing Grade 12.

Now in his NHL draft year, Schiller's stats certainly don't jump off the page screaming, "Pick me."

But, he said, "I see it as a marathon, not a sprint. I hope to get more chances to show what I can do next year."

Greyhounds' athletic therapist is a 'hockey guy'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you're a physiotherapist, there are plenty of places to ply your craft. But if you're also a hockey guy, then you've got to be at the rink.

Richard Rotenberg is a hockey guy, so it's no surprise that if you check his CV, you'll find plenty of hockey, hockey, hockey.

Rotenberg, 29, has been athletic therapist with the Sault Ste. Marie Greyhounds for the past two seasons. Before that, he worked with the Barrie Colts, and prior to that, he was with the Queen's University hockey program and the Kingston Voyageurs tier II junior A team.

"I'm a hockey guy," he said on the phone from the Soo. "I grew up playing hockey. That's where my passion lies."

With his training in sports and orthopedic applications, as well as cardio rehab and neurological rehab, hockey has proven to be the ideal venue for him and his skills. "My job essentially is to be with the team all day, every day," he said.

When you're working for a team playing a collision sport, there is no shortage of medical issues to deal with, such as cuts, broken bones, sprains and head injuries.

Most common are contusions (bruises) caused by collisions with players and pucks.

In his years in the OHL, the worst injury he encountered was a player who was knocked unconscious from a clean check. The player was taken off the ice on a stretcher and treated in hospital. Fortunately, the player "is doing great. He made a full recovery."

Working with hockey players is fascinating for Rotenberg. "You never know what you'll get from day to day. You're involved in the game, you meet fantastic people."

Working with juniors is particularly gratifying for him. "You see kids grow up and you try to be part of it the best way you can.

"At this point in my life, I love my job. I love the setting I work in, and it doesn't even feel like work," he said.

Bassist bases The Ancestry Project on his musical family

Heather Solomon

Zachary Lober wasn't born yet when his grandfather Hy "Blackie" Herman was at the height of his popularity as a bandleader in 1950s Montreal.

Now in his mid-30s, Lober remembers how when he joined his high school's music program, his grandfather began to share his memories.

He didn't learn about the Herman family's longer musical history until after he earned a degree at McGill University studying double bass and worked as a professional jazz bass player in Montreal from 2000 to 2005.

"I wasn't aware at all of my zaide's family's history with music until many years into studying music on my own. I can't explain why it wasn't common knowledge, but once I caught wind of it, I asked questions," Lober says.

He found out that his great-grandfather Israel Herman was a klezmer violinist in Borshov, Poland, with brothers Chaim, who was a drummer, and Sam, a violinist.

Zachary Lober

The family left for Canada in 1924 after a particularly virulent spate of pogroms terrorized the Jewish community. Israel brought along his wife and two-year-old son Hyman, who grew up to love the drums and work with music greats such as trumpet player Maynard Ferguson, and pianists Oscar Peterson and Paul Bley.

Zachary Lober is flanked by his grandparents, Sophie and Hyman Herman, who inspired Lober to write The Ancestry Project.

Lober completed his master's degree in 2007 at the Manhattan School of Music and remains based in New York. His grandfather's stories began to percolate into his creative life.

"I thought there's got to be a way to integrate this history into something that I can share that's personal. I recorded interviews with Zaide and decided to incorporate his words into music that I would write," Lober says.

The result is The Ancestry Project that played Brooklyn's IBeam performance space to rave reviews and is coming to Montreal's Segal Centre for Performing Arts on Feb. 21.

Lober hand-picked his band, including alto saxophonist David Binney, tenor saxophonist Chet Doxas with whom Lober has collaborated on CDs, pianist John Escreet, who has recorded with Lober in the performance collective The Story, and drummer Damion Reid.

Lober keeps the heartbeat going on both electric and double bass, and he mans the turntables and a midi-sequencer that pops out sound bites and cues certain phrases or plays the interview as an often humorous and sometimes touching narrative over the music.

"I have a whole other interest in hip-hop music and always admired scratch DJs. I had the idea to hit the recordings of Zaide's voice into the band by putting it onto vinyl and having a DJ improvise with his words," says Lober.

"I had to know how to write for the DJ, so I signed up for three months of lessons at the Rock and Soul School in New York and learned so much about the craft that I could do it myself."

The hour-long show follows Herman's immigration, his professional encounters, and admiration of mambo and cha-cha king Tito Puente, combined with snatches of that music and a traditional klezmer doina preserved from Israel Herman's day.

Most of the music, however, consists of Lober's original jazz compositions. His fiançée, Alice Zulkarnain, cues projections of wartime Poland and Herman's life and friends, providing a visual context.

"In New York, the audience reaction was great. Through my research, I even found out that the Herman family has a contingent in Long Island, and Chaim's grandson, Solly, a retired drummer and bandleader, came to the show with his wife.

"It was very moving for all of us. That sharing with family is going to happen in a big way in Montreal," says Lober, who will reserve a front row seat for his 86-year-old zaide.

After his Montreal appearance, Lober continues his work as a sideman in New York, Canada and Europe and participates in multiple international jazz festivals, but he's aiming for a major tour of The Ancestry Project.

To promote its availability, he's recording the Segal Centre performance on audio and video.

"I think there are a lot of people interested in the show as it relates to their own backgrounds," says Lober.

"It was important to me that it be performed in a theatre-type environment where the community would feel good about seeing it. I want to tour other Jewish cultural centres around the world."

Also, you can watch a video of Robert Sarner, the company's director of communication and public affairs, telling attendees at Jewish Employment Toronto's (JET) kickoff discussion/Q&A – a program held recently at JUMP (Jewish Urban Meeting Place) – how Roots, founded in 1972, stays relevant to a new generation of consumers.

אז אני צפונית

נינה שנהב
nina.shenhav@gmail.com

"זה כניראה הולך להיגמר עם החבר שלה, אז אני חייבת להביא אותה איתנו לקפה השבועי, בסדר?" מסבירה לי טלי בטלפון. אני דווקא יחסית די מחבבת את פזית, אחותה. זאת אומרת, לא ממש שונאת אותה. טלי: נינה הגעת. הזמנתי כבר לשלושתינו קפה ועוגות. אם בא לך גם על טוסט, זה כבר יהיה על חשבונך.

אני: הסירי דאגה מליבך. מה נשמע, פזית? שמעתי שזרקת סוף סוף את האירלנדי המעצבן שלך. הקטע שלו לסיים משפטים של אחרים הטריד מאוד.

אני (במהירות): להתנצל? כן. כניראה קיבלתי אינפורמציה מוטעית. אני מניחה שלהיפך, כלומר שהאירלנדי המעצבן שלך זרק אותך?

טלי (בזעם לעברי):יודעת מה, תזמיני טוסט. על חשבוני. ככה אולי תדברי פחות

אני: שהוא מסיים משפטים של אחרים? כן, מטריד מאוד. תכונה איומה.

אני: שהוא יתגייר. כן, אני לחלוטין מבינה. איך אחרת?

פזית: לא! העיקר בשבילי זו האהבה! טלי, אולי גם את תזמיני לך איזה טוסט?!

פזית: אולי תפסיקו לסיים בשבילי משפטים? אני מתה מגעגועים אליו בגללכן!

COCA-COLA SALAD

6 oz cherry-flavored kosher gelatin (not sugar-free)
1 c boiling water
10 oz Coca-Cola
16 oz.can red tart pitted cherries in water
8 oz. can crushed pineapple
1 c chopped pecans

Place gelatin in large bowl and pour over boiling water; stir until dissolved. Stir in Coca-Cola. Refrigerate mixture until partially firm, about 30 mins. Check and stir every 3-5 min. You want it thickened but not set.
Place cherries and juice in food processor fitted with knife blade or in blender. Pulse or blend a few times to lightly chop cherries. Once gelatin mixture has thickened, stir in chopped cherries & juice, pineapple & juice, and pecans. Pour into bowl or gelatin mold. Refrigerate until set or overnight. Remove salad from mold by inverting onto serving platter. Serve cold.

The CJN's French-language reporter in Montreal, Elias Levy, writes about:

French academic and author Shmuel Trigano, who talks about the Jewish community's problems with the Muslim communities in France.

A panel organized by Congrégation Or Hahayim in Côte Saint-Luc recently discussed the significance of the elections in Israel last month.

Exclusive to cjnews.com

Hebrew web columnist Yossi Tastassa says that Israel understands and recognizes the legitimacy of Israelis living outside the Jewish State.

The gap year challenge

Taking a gap year is a daunting thought. It is a promise to yourself to take the search for inner self to the next level.

The obvious comforts – friends, family, home – spring to mind first. Are you prepared to leave all of these behind, for a short while at least? Then the secondary doubts – school, travel partner, what to do – emerge.

These levels of worry build barriers. To find oneself, one must be willing not to worry; one must be willing to try; one must be willing to say not why, but why not. As Nestea says, "Take the plunge." Plunge into this opportunity of a lifetime.

The Roma: none is too many

Human rights organizations such as the Simon Wiesenthal Center are documenting an increase in violence and vandalism against the Roma and Jewish community of Hungary. Many Roma fearing for their families' lives have arrived in Canada in an attempt to find a safe home.

What they are discovering are laws passed and changes of policy by the Harper government that make refugee claims in Canada more difficult, especially for those coming from countries on Immigration Minister Jason Kenney's "safe" list – places where he says all citizens are safe and secure. Hungary is on that list.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

According to our new laws, refugee claimants from "safe" countries have a few weeks to prepare their hearings, a process you and I couldn't manage easily, and effectively lose their right of appeal. Further, people who claimed refugee status after Dec. 15, 2012, no longer have access to health care through the Interim Federal Health program, including pregnant women, children, and people facing acute crises such as heart attacks. Ask your federal MP to clarify how this is possible.

Kenney has travelled to Hungary and used Canadian tax dollars to underwrite a billboard campaign in Miskolc, a town with one of the largest Roma population in that country. The billboards urge Roma not to come to Canada, and state that "people will be returned very quickly" to Hungary.

The mayor of that town has also responded, threatening that Roma who leave Miskolc and then are shipped back by Canada are not welcome, and will be denied housing and schools for their children. These actions and statements sound eerily familiar. The Roma are truly people without a home.

The following is an email I received from Gina Csanyi-Robah, the executive director of the Toronto Roma Community Centre:

"Dear Avrum: Almost every Roma child from Hungary and the Czech Republic that I have taught in Toronto has reported abuse at school – physical, verbal, and psychological violence from teachers and other students and their parents. Many have reported beatings by skinheads and have shown me scars on their bodies. Many have been deported now. I have had a number of reported teenage suicide attempts as deportation becomes eminent.

"In April 2011, 200 Hungarian Roma families were terrorized for three weeks by neo-Nazis who came to the village of Gyongyospata as participants in a Jobbik rally. Jobbik is a neo-Nazi styled political party that has representation in the Hungarian parliament. The thugs entered schools, stood outside homes, they followed people to the stores and shouted Hitler-like remarks and threatened death."

The police stood by. The Red Cross stepped in. Gina added that many families from Gyongyospata are here as refugees claimants and that two families came to the Roma Centre and told their story to Kenney on Oct. 29, 2011. "These families have lost their asylum claim and are now in the process of removal," Gina lamented.

What's incredibly bizarre, while all of this is happening, Kenney was invited to light a flame of remembrance on International Holocaust Remembrance Day – Jan. 27 – by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. Somehow, along the road we have redefined our hands-on commitment to "never again" and forgotten we are "none is too many."

Please fix this part of our world. It is broken. Call the Roma Community Centre at 1344 Bloor St. W., at 416-546-2524. See www.romatoronto.org and/or the Facebook group: Toronto Roma Community Centre. Offer help.

After so much Holocaust education, we should know what to do.

Doulas there to help the new mother

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Pregnant women once used to ask each other, "Who's your doctor?"

Today the question for some is becoming, "Who's your doula?"

If you're wondering, "What's a doula?" the answer is she's a blend of old and new. From an ancient Greek word meaning "female slave," she serves a very traditional role, helping a new mother before, during and after childbirth.

According to the professional organization DONA International, a doula "does not perform clinical or medical tasks such as taking blood pressure or temperature, fetal heart tone checks, vaginal examinations or postpartum clinical care." But she can do almost anything else, from childbirth education to support at home and at the hospital.

Unlike a doctor or nurse, a doula's only responsibility is to care for the mother. Referring to the original Greek, Toronto doula Rachel Shifra Tal, CD(DONA) (a DONA-certified doula), says that "we are a slave to the mother's needs. We're working under her… we're supporting the woman 100 per cent.

"Just because you're in a hospital doesn't mean you're going to have your needs met or have a say in your own care," Tal says. "Most women don't realize [that] their doctor has maybe a 25 per cent chance of being at the birth… they figure… they're going to be monitored every minute."

A doula generally stays "from whenever they call us until two hours after the birth." That constant, reassuring presence, studies have shown, creates better outcomes: fewer Caesarian-sections, lower episiotomy rate, faster recoveries, less postpartum depression and more successful breastfeeding.

Tal meets many "fear-based clients or first time mothers – or both." She's shocked that women feel compelled to share horror stories of labours gone wrong with expectant mothers. "Seasoned mothers think it's okay to tell all these stories to new mothers."

Fathers, too, may be apprehensive. "We were fighting for a couple of generations to get husbands into the delivery room," Jerusalem doula Sarah Goldstein, CD(DONA), says. "Once we got them there, some husbands didn't want to be there, some were very confused about what they should do."

Hiring a doula won't shut out the husband if he wants to stay, Goldstein says. She's not there to replace him, but "to help him to help her.

"Sometimes, birth can be very long, and he's spent, emotionally and physically… As part of that birth team, [a doula] can help… strengthen their relationship."

"The main thing I hear from husbands," Tal says, "is, 'Thank God you were here so I could just be the husband.' They felt more confident in their role because they had somebody behind them all the time." That sometimes means literally. "I've caught a few husbands who've passed out."

Goldstein, author of Special Delivery: Jewish Birth Stories of Faith and Inspiration and a sequel, More Special Deliveries, is seeing more demand for doulas in Israel.

As in Canada, the doula's fee is not covered by public or private health insurance. Occasionally, a close relative who wants to give new parents something truly special will offer to pay for a doula. Less-experienced doulas who are not yet well-established may also negotiate a lower rate for their professional services. Student doulas may also be available as an "extra pair of hands" for those who can't afford a doula, says Goldstein, a former social worker who has been training doulas for nearly eight years.

Tal says, "If you're going to… climb Kilimanjaro, you're going to need a tour guide. Birth is an uncharted territory. You need somebody who's been there." Even experienced mothers can benefit, particularly if they've had a past C-section, or if they've had a traumatic or alienating birth experience.

Goldstein sees the doula's job as a spiritual one. "Birth is a time when we're bringing a Jewish neshamah [soul] into the world," says Goldstein, who made aliyah from the United States 33 years ago. "It's a time we connect to something very godly, something that is beyond us." Giving birth can both challenge and awaken women and help them find "strength and courage we never knew we had."

"The Shchinah [God's presence] is there in the delivery room," Goldstein says.

The major drawback to a medicalized birth experience, Goldstein says, is that "we're taking away from women the ability to understand their bodies, [and] instilling a fear." We've come to believe our bodies are weak, but "given the proper support system… if we're treated in a humane way in a birth setting… most women can rise above it and go through the challenge of birth."

Goldstein says that "becoming a mother is the first step toward a lifetime of [empowering] ourselves and our children… We need to be advocates for them, and our first step is in the birthing room."

But DONA warns that the "advocacy role does not include the doula speaking instead of the client or making decisions." Instead, she must convey "the client's wishes… by encouraging her client to ask questions… and to express her preferences and concerns."

Unfortunately, the term "doula" is unregulated: anyone can call herself a doula, and in rare cases, doctors or hospitals have refused to work with doulas, based on a few overstepping the bounds of advocacy, arguing or making unsafe medical recommendations.

"We're not able to come in there with our own agenda…," Tal says. "I want the mother to feel empowered, to feel her voice matters, that she's an active participant in her birth, if she so chooses."

She says she decided to become a midwife after seeing her first birth at 11, and she chose to be a doula after moving to Israel with her parents as a teenager. In the past, she says, doulas weren't necessary because mothers and grandmothers helped at births. Our generation, suffering from a "collective amnesia," has lost that experience to twilight sleep and medical intervention. Through restoring women's confidence, she says, "I would personally love to work myself out of a job."

Tal, who is also a rebbetzin, opening her home for Shabbat meals and Torah classes, sees a lot of overlap between her roles. "Being a doula and being a rebbetzin are the same thing, in a way… you experience very intense life situations with people, counsel people in difficulties, crises, challenges. It's very holy work."

Back to nature to reduce illness

What is damaging to the environment could also be detrimental to your health, says Betty Rozendaal, a naturopathic doctor in Thornhill, Ont.

The environment and health are two concepts that Rozendaal has merged into one. She believes that environmental toxins, whether from the air we breathe or the products we use, have a major impact on both our physical condition and the natural world.

"We have been conditioned to believe that we need certain products. People don't realize that these product choices impact both the environment and our health," Rozendaal says.

She emphasizes that there are some simple changes that can be made to reduce your exposure to environmental toxins. These can be as simple as changing the products you buy. For example, you can switch from regular produce to organic, and choose less harmful cleaning supplies. One suggestion she offers is exchanging household chemical cleaning products for a vinegar and water solution or baking soda. Vinegar can even be used to create an acid solution to wash fruits and vegetables, in order to minimize the ingestion of harmful chemicals that were once sprayed on them.

Rozendaal practises what she preaches. When she set up her practice, she paid special attention to both the methods and the materials that were used to renovate her clinic. Her intention was to reduce the allergens and toxins that she and her patients would be exposed to on a daily basis.

Dr. Betty Rozendaal performs acupuncture.

She stresses the importance of harmony between nature and humans. "We are living in a world where we have as much impact on the environment as it has on us."

Prior to becoming a naturopathic doctor, Rozendaal worked as an environmental consultant. Early in her career she travelled to Indonesia to help develop an environmental research centre. This sparked her interest in teaching people how to take care of their environment. She noticed that in many developing countries, the environmental standards were lower than those in North America.

Clean water, a basic need for survival, was often contaminated by household and industrial waste. Her role was to teach people how to check the quality of water. She hoped that she was leaving them with the skills needed to ensure quality and safe drinking water.

As a child, Rozendaal already had health care as a career idea in the back of her mind. After completing two degrees in environmental science, travelling, working in the environmental field and spending many years working for various large energy companies, she made the decision to become a naturopathic doctor. It seemed the obvious choice to her as a way to merge her two fields of interest. Her primary goal was to educate people and lessen the disconnect between what we do and the effect on our health.

"It's important for people to be informed in the choices they make and the impacts it will have. Awareness is key," Rozendaal says.

Being healthy does not have to be difficult. By simplifying the products we use and turning back to nature, we can improve both the environment and our health.

Fitness program combines several disciplines

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

"No matter what your fitness level is, or your age, you can benefit from doing non-impact exercises," says Hayley Borden of Toronto, the creator of Pilatecize, a custom fitness program that combines a number of programs and techniques.

Pilatecize combines the core principles of Pilates, the flexibility of yoga, the balance and co-ordination of the exercise ball, strength training with resistance bands and ballet movements into one complete mind/body workout.

Recognized internationally as a fitness health expert, motivational speaker and sports enthusiast, the 48-year-old has trained many celebrities and professional athletes including members of the Toronto Blue Jays, the Rolling Stones, PGA golfers, professional squash, tennis and soccer players, and corporate executives.

Borden, who is a certified pilates fitness expert, says that with Pilatecize, you can get twice the workout in half the time, and she stresses that the right attitude is essential to support a healthy lifestyle.

"As you strive to live a fit, healthy lifestyle, your mind is the best tool you have. Your thoughts and your attitude can make all the difference. By changing them, you can change your life."

She told The CJN that she learned the hard way. "About 17 years ago, I was a single mother, depressed, overweight and out of shape. I realized I needed help."

She began taking courses in holistic nutrition and, along with changes in food and exercise, she took acting classes and is a member of ACTRA.

She went on to take her personal training certificate at Ryerson University and later taught body movement as a faculty member in the drama department.

Borden could be a prototype for the Zoomer generation. She has completed numerous marathons, triathlons and motocross events, and done racecar driving, scuba diving and skydiving.

Paul Godfrey, former president of the Toronto Blue Jays Baseball Club, in a thank you-note to Borden on behalf of the team, notes that her Pilatecize program was of significant assistance to the players and coaches.

"I hope that the Pilatecize program will become part of our regular strengthening and conditioning program to improve the players' flexibility, strength and performance," he wrote.

Holt Renfrew, a leading retail store, featured Borden in an all-day event titled All About You, which focused on health and well-being.

"Her bubbly personality and wealth of knowledge was definitely an asset. Our customers loved her," said Sally Scott, director of marketing for Holt Renfrew.

"Haley is truly Toronto's queen of Pilates. She makes exercising fun and enjoyable. She teaches you to understand your body and work with it, not against it. She actually makes me look forward to working out."

This message is reflected in a note from Sherry Cooper, a global economic strategist and executive vice-president of Harris Bank (Chicago) and BMO Financial Group (Toronto).

"An hour with Haley Borden flies by, but the results are amazing. Within a few sessions, you can see and feel the results of increased muscle toning and strength."

She adds, "Haley customizes the workout for all levels and pre-conditions. She has a bubbly personality and clearly enjoys her work."

Borden has appeared in numerous television commercials and writes for a variety of magazines.

Coach works with female runners over 40

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Bennett Cohen is an unlikely person to head the International Association of Women Runners.

The 55-year-old father of two wears two hats. By day he's a business executive working in the computer component industry, but on weekends and evenings he specializes in coaching female runners aged 40 years and older.

"Coaching is a labour of love. I've been passionate about running since 1979," Cohen says, explaining that he started running that year because he thought "it would be a good activity to counterbalance his sedentary job as a mechanical engineer."

While Cohen switched careers four years later – he went back to school to get an MBA – running has remained an important part of his life.

He also started doing research on running and exercise physiology. Other runners began asking him for advice, or they had running questions, and that research work led to active coaching evenings and weekends.

When he began coaching 12 years ago, he worked with both men and women "The practice eventually migrated to women," he says, "because my three-day-a-week running program appealed to women with busy schedules."

Much of Cohen's research focused on best training practices and injury prevention, and he discovered that the public was getting a lot of misinformation. "There are myths perpetrated in pop media that had been disproved by scientific research."

A case in point is the myth that training five or six days a week can improve one's results. Cohen points out that people following such a rigorous routine are often overtraining, which can make them more injury prone. "The body needs time for recovery."

Running three days a week, you'll race your best and reduce the risk of injury.

"None of my coaching clients have missed their goals in a race due to injury, while following my program, and practically all of them have dramatically improved their times running three days a week," he says.

Another myth is the practice of stretching as part of a warm-up. "Everyone believed that stretching would reduce injury, but research shows that there's no proof that stretching reduces injury."

In fact, he says stretching before a race can result in a slower running.

He also recommends exercises that strengthen the feet and lower legs to prevent injury.

Cohen is now spreading the word on injury prevention for runners with his recently published ebook, Injury Free Running for Women Over 40. The advice is applicable to runners of both genders, he says.

"Research studies show that 63 per cent of runners get injured every year," he says. "There is a huge need in the general running community to have access to information based on real science to reduce the risk of injury."

He adds that his ebook provides solutions on how to get back to running following an injury.

In 2009, Cohen and his wife, Gail Gould, formed the International Association of Women Runners. Among the services it offers is a free weekly newsletter covering a variety of topics that include nutrition, training tips and injury prevention.

Cohen says he finds coaching with women very rewarding, because they tend to be motivated by intrinsic or internal factors such as what happens to them emotionally as a result of achieving their running goals.

"It's a generalization, but men are more motivated by extrinsic factors like competing against someone, he explains. "They want to run faster than their buddy, or they want to run a race in a particular time."

When women reach their goals, they find they often have increased confidence, he says. "A feeling of success spills over into other areas of their life. They become positive role models for friends and peers."

He says the runners he attracts are not beginners. "They have specific goals that they want to accomplish."

And his personalized running and training program is done in an unconventional way – through phone and email. "This removes the geographical restrictions of traditional coaching," he says. "Coaching clients by phone and email fits well for women with busy schedules."

His clients live all over North America, and he actually works with a woman from Christmas Island, which is off the coast of Australia. "I do most of the coaching by email," he says, "but I also speak with her by phone."

One of his most memorable coaching experiences was his work seven years ago with a woman who was not athletic. "She was the type of person who would be chosen last for a team in gym class."

He coached her for four months to help her achieve her goal of running a half marathon.

"She completed the training and stuck with the program. On race day she completed the half marathon and beat her goal time.

"She said to me, 'For the first time in my life I feel like an athlete.' That was one of the most meaningful compliments I ever received as a coach. You could see the transformation in her over the time I worked with her."

Injury Free Running for Women Over 40 can be downloaded at this webpage: injuryfreerunningforwomen.com. For information about coaching, go to www.iawr-connect.com/coaching or phone 1-888-565-7444.

Healthy eating starts at the grocery store

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

There are few of us who aren't aware of our waistlines, and even fewer who don't secretly wish we could be a different shape – usually thinner. And it's common sense that what we eat has a major impact on our size. But so does how we shop for our food. The trip to the grocery store and the way we go through the aisles is the starting point for our consumption. Change that pattern and there's a good chance we could change our shape, too. Here are some suggestions.

Don't shop hungry. The golden rule of grocery shopping is to eat before you leave home. Hunger can make everything look good, and by shopping on a full stomach, you're likely to have more control over your purchases.

Shop around the perimeter of the store. When you arrive, avoid the centre aisles in favour of the perimeter, says Jennifer Libman, a Toronto dietician. "This is where the healthiest products like fresh fruits and vegetables, milk and other dairy products, grain products and meats and alternatives are found," she says. The bulk of your shopping cart should be comprised of fruit and vegetables – canned and frozen varieties are okay too, she adds. "Just make sure to choose ones without added salt or sugar. And challenge yourself to try a new fruit or vegetable every week!"

Check what's inside the product. It's useful to look at the ingredients list of a product you're considering buying. But be sure to check out the serving size first, Libman says. "Small packages may actually contain two or three servings of the product, so look out for that. Use nutritional labels to compare similar products and choose the ones that are lower in fat, saturated fat and sodium, and higher in fibre and vitamins and minerals."

Lauren Kramer shops for produce.

If you are going to shop the centre aisles for snacks, choose air popped or light microwave popcorn, pretzels, baked chips, cut up fruits and vegetables, unsalted nuts and whole grain cookies. "No-sugar-added puddings, bean dips and low-fat cheese are OK, but watch out for sugary drinks," Libman says. "Water is always the best – or low-fat milk, tea and small amounts of 100 per cent juice."

Those centre aisles are home to processed food like sugary cereals, white starches, pastas and bottled fruit punches that contain high fructose corn syrup. If these aisles are your usual haunts, be warned – they are dangerous territory for shoppers. The trouble is, those processed foods are so nicely packaged, they're very tempting, says Suzie Fishbein, author of the Kosher by Design cookbook series.

Be snack smart. "Choose nuts for snacking and keep your fridge stocked with lots of fresh fruit that's prepared and cut up," Fishbein advises. "If you see melon cubes in a beautiful bowl, you might be more inclined to eat it than if it was a whole melon. One of my late-night snack treats is fat-free whipped cream and strawberries, but consider freezing grapes for those sweet cravings, or stock up on different flavoured rice cakes."

Make your own meals as much as possible. Many people complain that they do not have time to cook, a prime reason they reach for processed meals. But no one has that little time, Fishbein insists. "An egg white omelette will take you four minutes to make for dinner. A piece of flounder, sole or tilapia is healthy and cooks fast – in seven minutes. Add some whole-wheat couscous and you have a healthy meal," she suggests.

No time to roast a chicken? Opt for chicken pieces or chicken breasts, as they cook faster. "Don't make being short of time an excuse to eat inferior and unhealthy food," Fishbein says.

Stronger friendships for a happier, longer life

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

In her recent book, MWF Seeks BFF (dating-scene slang for "married white female seeks best friend forever"), author Rachel Bertsche wrote that "having strong friendships is more likely to make a person happy than is having money."

Sibby Sherman probably knew that already. At 79, she says more than six decades of friendship with her BFFs has kept her going through good times and bad. "It's helped a lot."

From four girls in their early teens – "Frances, Dorothy, Phyllis and myself" – in downtown Toronto, the group expanded in high school to include four more – Ruth, Sylvia, Audrey and Violet. "They joined in, and we just became very good friends... We had our own club, called Club Tamar."

Their single days were a fertile time for friendships and fun. "We had a ball at the Hadassah Bazaar. Some of the girls went to Sainte-Agathe [Que.] for summer vacation, winter vacation. We used to go to Crystal Beach [Ont.] – it was the place to be. My parents had a cottage there, many moons ago."

Even hard at work, they were together. While Phyllis helped in her family's women's wear store, Sherman says, "Frances and I would go there on the weekends and help her. We had a ball doing that."

Marriage and children never interrupted. "We were at each other's bar mitzvahs, bat mitzvahs, weddings... it was a little bit hard to see each other as much, but we still kept in touch." Phyllis married and moved to New York, but always made an effort to come back to mingle with the old crowd.

They still try to get together once a month, a dinner date they all look forward to. Ruth Berger, 80, says, "It's great to be around them... We've been through good times and bad times. There's been divorces, we've had husbands die, we've always been together through that."

Researching her book, Bertsche found studies showing that good friendships seem to help heart health. In one study of Swedish men, lack of social support was "one of the two leading risk factors for heart attacks and death from coronary artery disease" (the other was smoking).

A 2004 study of women in the United States showed that strong social ties may improve survival among women with suspected coronary artery disease. Factors included how many people the women socialized with and the types of interactions. And the American Journal of Clinical Oncology published a report in August 2012 showing that social attachments may help patients with ovarian cancer.

Bertsche wrote that, with breast cancer in her mother's family, "when I came across a study of women with breast cancer that found that those who had 10 or more close friends pre-diagnosis were four times more likely to survive... I take note... My mom, so far, has been cancer-free. Still, this study makes me want to round up the neighbours and drag them to her apartment until she's weaving friendship bracelets with 10 other middle-aged women. You can't be too careful."

Bertsche's quest was spurred by a move away from New York City where she'd always lived close to longtime BFFs. Her goal wasn't replacing them, but finding new friends she can call at the drop of a hat. She quotes an essay in which author Ann Patchett writes: "That's my idea of real intimacy: it's not the person who calls to say, 'I'm having an affair'; it's the friend who calls to say, 'Why do I have four jars of pickles in my refrigerator?'"

Sherman and her buddies are "jars of pickle" friends – always have been, always will be. "We've had our wonderful good times," says Sherman, "and we've had our tragedies," like when one friend lost her son and they all came together to offer support, along with family and other friends. "Of course, we do have other friends... this is just our 'group.'"

"When we [each] had our first grandchild, Frances Shauh... would make us a beautiful afghan. My older granddaughter is 27; to this day... she snuggles up with it – she will not let that afghan go."

The friends have also comforted each other through the loss of three of their own: Edith, Phyllis and Violet. "Violet... borrowed my wedding gown," Sherman says. "I was married a few months before her, and she loved my gown so much, she actually wore my gown. That goes to show how close we were."

The secret to staying close? Sherman says, "Really keep in touch with each other. Don't let years go by that you don't talk to each other." And let grudges go for the sake of peace. "I don't recall ever having a real argument... We've never come to the point where we've stopped talking to each other."

And a spontaneous phone call can't hurt. "When Frances called me to wish me a happy new year from Florida, her first words were 'Happy New Year, girlfriend!' Even at our age, we consider ourselves girlfriends."

Girlfriends are great, according to life-cycle expert Gail Sheehy. In an October 2011 article in USA Today, she reported on a Gallup-Healthways poll showing that women with strong friendships are more likely to be optimistic and have a strong sense of meaning and engagement in their lives. And by "friendship," she meant real-life, pick-up-the-phone-and-call friendships, not online virtual "friends," who won't be there, Sheehy wrote, "when you have a blowup with your boss and fear for your job. If you have no ready social outlet, you'll likely start to sleep poorly and feel your energy drain. The best way to recover optimism is to walk and talk with a girlfriend or a group."

For the past couple of years, with some of the group away in Florida each winter, Sherman and her friends here in Toronto have made their own sunshine bonding over mah-jong. "We just love it – it's a game we enjoy, but it's also a social time for us. That's when we do all our chatting."

As for Bertsche, she didn't exactly find a new BFF in the year allotted for the challenge. But she did finish the year far less lonely than at the start, having unearthed a few facts about friendship that Sherman probably could have told her years ago.

Being friends, says Sherman simply, has "just made us complete and just so happy." Her old friend Ruth Berger agrees. "There's nothing like the old friends... We have history. We really do have history."

Rose Reisman's tips on eating healthy in restaurants

Jennifer Friedman
Special to The CJN

Now that the rich meals and indulgent desserts that represent the holiday season are behind us, many Canadians are ready to make healthy changes for the new year.

Busy lives and packed schedules can make sticking to resolutions difficult, and it's often tempting to turn to restaurants to make our lives a little easier. Restaurant meals, however, are almost always higher in calories, fat and sodium than foods prepared at home, and menu descriptions can be deceiving, making it difficult to know which items are healthy choices.

Rose Reisman, health and wellness entrepreneur, has some advice to help Canadians navigate restaurant menus so that they can eat out without sacrificing their health.

Her latest book, Choose It and Lose It, aims to help Canadians make healthy choices when they are dining in restaurants.

"The typical Canadian eats out 11 times during a two-week period," said Reisman. "The good news is that you can make significant changes to your health by learning how to make informed decisions and not being fooled by healthy-sounding menu descriptions. It's possible to eat out seven days a week without ever gaining weight."

Rose Reisman

Choose It and Lose It takes on several common myths about restaurant meals. One is the mistaken belief that vegetarian dishes are always healthy. "Meatless dishes can contain loads of fat, cheese, oil or nuts, and can be very high in calories, overall fat and even saturated fat," said Reisman.

Another misconception is that chicken and fish dishes are always healthier than red meat. "Things like tuna are packed in oil and mixed with mayonnaise, and chicken is often battered or fried," she said. "As a health-conscious consumer, you always need to ask how the foods are prepared."

Learning restaurant jargon is key to making healthy choices. "Decoding menu descriptions can be tricky, but there are certain buzzwords that you can watch for when deciding what to order," said Reisman. For example, words like "crispy" or "crunchy" typically means the item has been deep-fried. Secret sauces are often mayonnaise or oil based, and prime meats can contain 50 per cent more calories and fat than other cuts of meat.

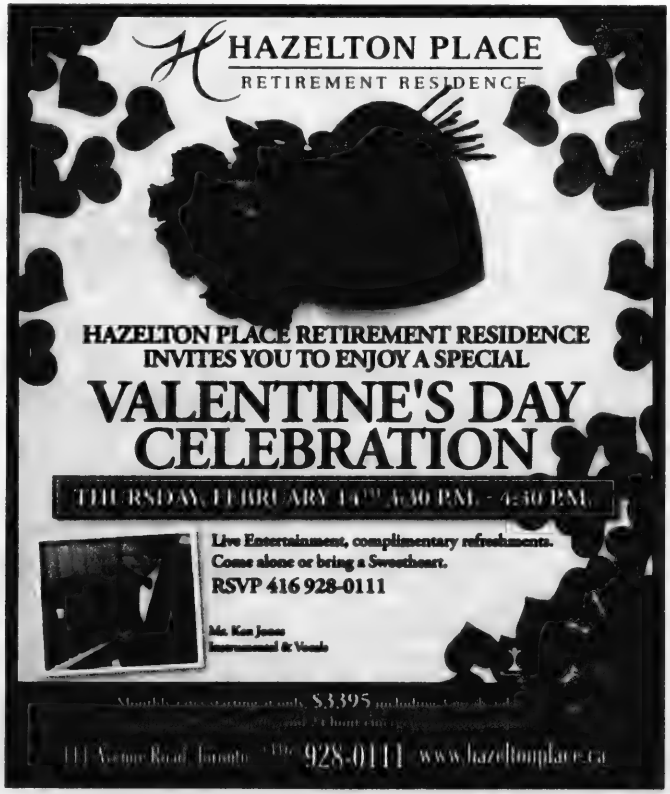
"Look for menu descriptions like grilled, poached, roasted or baked," said Reisman. "These cooking methods tend to use less fat." Diners should feel free to ask for menu items to be customized to their own needs. "Even if it's not listed on the menu, doesn't mean it can't be prepared in the kitchen."

Choose It and Lose It also offers guidance to readers about the healthier options available at common ethnic restaurants. Regardless of the type of restaurant you end up in, it's possible to make healthy choices.

Reisman encourages parents to let their children choose from the regular menu rather than the one for kids. "Children's menus are almost always full of deep-fried options and rarely have very many vegetables," she said. "Even if the portions are too large, it's better to take half home or split amongst two kids."

Parents should be aware that their children learn by example, so if they want to teach their children good eating habits, then they should be making healthy choices as well, Reisman stresses. "Kids learn by osmosis – they'll want to order what you do."

The good news is that eating healthy in restaurants doesn't mean you need to give up dessert. The key is to keep it small. "Usually, we can satisfy our sweet tooth after a few bites, so why do we need to eat such a large portion?" said Reisman. "Split a dessert among the table, or better yet, many restaurants are now offering miniature-sized desserts so you can still have that sweet ending to your meal."



Mount Sinai poet-in-residence helps staff build resilience

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

There's nothing unusual about people lining up in the cafeteria at Mount Sinai Hospital. But on this day in October, the lineup was not for food.

Patients, volunteers and clinical and administrative staff were waiting at the Spontaneous Poetry Booth, where poet Ronna Bloom was sitting at the table writing poetry on demand.

"I wrote 20 poems in 1-1/2 hours," she recalls. "I said to people, 'What do you need a poem about?' Then I would write a poem about the subject for a dollar."

The money went to the hospital, she adds.

This poetry booth is one of several projects Bloom is spearheading as poet-in-residence at Mount Sinai Hospital. Her term officially began this past fall.

A writer, psychotherapist, teacher and author of five books of poetry, Bloom was awarded a $10,000 artist-in-the-workplace grant by the Ontario Arts Council, which Mount Sinai Hospital agreed to match.

The programs she's offering include readings on the medical units, as well as workshops and writing coaching sessions for staff.

The poet-in-residence falls under the auspices of the health, arts and humanities program of the University of Toronto department of psychiatry's division of psychotherapy, the humanities and educational studies.

Dr. Allan Peterkin, a psychiatrist at Mount Sinai, heads the health, arts and humanities program at U of T.

"We're trying to introduce all kind of arts-based learning. It's about how the arts can inform the work we do as clinicians."

This humanities/arts educational group thought it would be "exciting" to have a poet on site at the hospital, he says, explaining that poetry allows for periods of reflection. "People can explore challenges and conflicts."

The poetry workshops enable staff to cope with stress. "It helps the staff take better care of themselves. This program builds resilience."

Peterkin says the poet-in-residence is an extension of narrative medicine, which he often utilizes in his clinical work with patients. He notes that narrative medicine – which incorporates storytelling with patients – can be done through reflective writing or even through reading literature.

"There is a culture of honouring stories at Mount Sinai," he says, pointing out that the hospital runs several narrative medicine programs embracing arts and humanities, among them, a monthly cinema group and a literary journal, which are both open to public participation.

Ronna Bloom, left, poet- in-residence at Mount Sinai Hospital, is seen at the Spontaneous Poetry Booth with Melissa Barton, the hospital's director of occupational health, wellness and safety.

The hospital publishes its journal, Ars Medica: A Journal of Medicine, the Arts and Humanities, twice a year.

The new poetry program adds another dimension to arts and humanities at the hospital, Peterkin says.

"The poet-in-residence is a perfect fit. Ronna is a gifted poet and teacher. We are really fortunate to have her."

Bloom, who gives a course in personal narrative writing in the continuing education department at U of T, has also been the university's "poet-in-community" since 2008.

In that capacity, she has facilitated several series of workshops at the university using poetry.

"The workshops help students and staff explore their passions and needs in a non-academic environment. It's a way to integrate their scholarly interests with their personal life and concerns," she says.

At Mount Sinai, staff use the writing workshops to connect to what they're doing, she says. "It's a way to ask questions, to write about personal feelings and to reflect on their work life."

The workshops are usually one hour long. "There's a lot of intimacy," but she stresses that there is no pressure for participants who come from many different departments, to share what they write.

But when people do share, "they express relief that they can express bottled-up feelings through their writing," she says.

"They are often surprised that their experiences are echoed by other people in the room."

Bloom describes the writing process as "a kind of alchemy between the poem and the person. We don't know what's coming. It's quite an amazing thing to get out of the way and let the poem come."

Food can be your best medicine

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

Broccoli whisks carcinogens out of your cells. Tomatoes disrupt a merger of molecules that could be carcinogenic. Garlic lowers your cholesterol.

Almost daily, headlines shout out a new study reiterating what Hippocrates knew all along – "Thy food shall be thy remedy." Certainly the father of medicine wasn't referring to burgers and fries, fried chicken and pepperoni pizza, North Americans' favourite foods, even though reams of research indicate a diet high in fat and low in fibre contributes to every illness from colon cancer to heart disease.

Enter the baby boomers, the first generation to try to deliberately reverse the aging process and progression of disease and be proactive in extending their lives. They are excitedly entering produce sections, piling fruits and vegetables into shopping carts.

But after being told for years that a vitamin a day keeps the doctor away, why should we suddenly believe we can not only get enough nutrition out of our food, but that it will prevent and cure disease?

We simply need to read the latest studies disproving claims for supplements such as beta-carotene.

First it was the widely publicized CARET study that said beta-carotene might not be the answer to heart disease. Then the New England Journal of Medicine's report linking it to cancer was decidedly pessimistic. But the topper is a new study reported in the Journal of the American Chemical Society, which reiterated the importance of taking beta-carotene with vitamins C and E because using it alone can cause it to turn into a damaging free radical.

Even the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, while acknowledging that foods rich in vitamin E and beta-carotene can help cancer and heart disease, do not make the same claim for the supplements.

"This does not invalidate Linus Pauling's lifetime study of vitamin C and its connection to the prevention and cure of the common cold, that iron is closely linked with anemia, calcium is important in preventing osteoporosis, folic acid (one of the B vitamins) can help block birth defects. But the variety of nutrients you get from your diet can't be replaced by supplements from the health food stores," says Riva Touger-Decker, director of the master's program in clinical nutrition at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey...

"If you eat carrots, you're getting beta carotene, dietary fibre, carotenoids, phytochemicals. If you take a beta-carotene supplement, that's all you're getting. And you're not even sure it's being absorbed," Touger-Decker says.

"If you need vitamins, something is wrong with your diet," says nutritionist and registered dietitian Elissa Fleiss.

"Supplements are medicine," says Annemarie Colbin, author of Food and Healing (Ballantine, 1996). "People should be cautious before taking them."

Keith Ayoob, assistant professor of pediatrics at Albert Einstein College of Medicine in New York City, stresses the danger of taking megadoses of single nutrients. "Vitamins and minerals work synergistically and interrelate. By taking too much of one, you risk creating an imbalance."

Linda Van Horn, professor of preventive medicine at Northwestern Medical School, agrees. "People think just because they're popping vitamin E, or even a cholesterol-lowering pill, they can continue devouring their daily dose of greasy hamburgers, chocolate doughnuts and banana cream pie."

On the other hand, phytochemicals (naturally occurring chemicals found in fruits, vegetables, legumes and whole grains) not only yield a plethora of vitamins and minerals, they are also effective at fighting and preventing killer diseases including cancer, heart disease and hypertension, she adds.

"Then my mother was right when she told me to finish my spinach," muses Marvin Geller, director of Princeton University's counselling centre.

"But maybe she should have added kale, Brussels sprouts, broccoli, cauliflower, collard and turnip greens, kale and okra," says Ayoob.

"With the explosion of knowledge, it's hard to make unconscious decisions anymore," Geller says. "We're told if we eat dessert, our arteries will get clogged; if we pass up our vegetables, we're missing an opportunity for phytochemicals. We can't even look at food without thinking about which ones will make us live longer."

Calcium is one of the supplements routinely prescribed to prevent and treat osteoporosis, but its most beneficial sources are highly controversial.

Andrew Nicholson, director of preventive medicine for Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine in Washington, D.C., stresses that the best source of calcium is greens and beans. He scoffs at the visual of celebrities wearing milk moustaches as a fraudulent campaign connecting dairy products with good bones.

"Eating a high dairy, high meat diet is dangerous – people don't need that much protein," Fleiss says.

She, Nicholson, Dr. Dean Ornish, founder of the Preventive Medicine Research Institute for the cure of heart disease, and John Robbins, among others, recommend a plant-based diet, citing that too much protein and fat causes many diseases including heart disease and osteoporosis.

Researchers at Michigan State showed that by age 65, female vegetarians had a measurable bone loss of 18 per cent while meat eaters lost 35 per cent.

Diet has also proven beneficial in the treatment of diabetes. Nicholson says patients are achieving miraculous results by changing to a high-fibre, low-fat, plant-based diet. There's a dramatic decrease in their medical needs; many can eliminate their daily dose of insulin altogether.

Dr. Anthony Capobianco, doctor of osteopathy, in Long Island, N.Y., doesn't give people lists of what to eat and what to avoid. "It's not about changing diets – it's about raising your consciousness... It's [also] important to love what you eat. If someone absolutely hates broccoli, no matter how healthy it is, it won't do him any good."

Just meditate... without the baggage

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Everyone agrees – you should learn to meditate. For stress, better sleep, to relax, enjoy your family life, or improve your focus on school or career.

Maybe your doctor even suggested meditation, now that its health benefits have been reported in studies from Harvard University and other mainstream institutions.

But it's easier said than done, as Torontonian Mordechai Chemel discovered. A social worker who spent 10 years counselling clients with stressful medical conditions, he quickly realized that very few professionals had resources to help beginners get started. Clients are told, "I don't really know. See what's online."

Online, they usually find two possibilities: a popular but complicated medical meditation program, largely inaccessible to laypeople – in which case, "they're in for a long, complicated, overwhelming ride," Chemel says – or one of many religious meditation programs.

"People may be hesitant to go to the local monastery or Zen temple," says Chemel, who studied advanced meditation in Japan before he received his master's degree from the Wurzweiler School of Social Work at Yeshiva University. "In addition to learning meditation's benefits... [they're] also exposed to all kinds of religious philosophy sprinkled in... The whole environment may have all kinds of things that a Jewish person specifically is not going to be comfortable with, like idols, burning incense, etc."

Chemel hoped to create a program that could guide a person with no previous experience directly into meditation, without additional religious messages: "Why not extract the key essential components... and create a program that can be easily learned and practiced?"

Chemel spent years combing through those complex meditation programs, drawing out "their essential therapeutic aspects and then creating a user-friendly easy-to-learn meditation program." Along the way, he recruited four co-authors to share their areas of expertise, creating a program they could all stand behind: practical, engaging, easy-to-learn and affordable. "They all edited and added their pieces to it," says Chemel.

His co-authors were James Brawer, a professor of anatomy and cell biology at McGill's faculty of medicine whose interest in meditation evolved from years of teaching functional neuroanatomy; Dr. Lionel Gerber, a psychiatrist with Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre; Abe Kass, a Toronto social worker in private family practice, and Leo Steiner, a Toronto clinical psychologist in private practice who uses relaxation techniques and cognitive therapy with his clients.

Mordechai Chemel

The result, Chemel says, is a three-CD program he calls the "A to Z of meditation." Available through the authors' website, healthbasedmeditation.com, both in CD form for $45.99 or as an MP3 download for $29.99, the program jumps right in with its first track, the "Quick Start Instructions."

Chemel says, "We're not asking a person to stop their job or change their schedule. It's just 15 to 20 minutes once or twice a day... The program's designed to be manageable. We're not looking at hours sitting on a mountaintop."

The short, guided sessions cover the basics such as what to wear, how to sit, where to sit, ways to sit – "including on a chair, so it really is accessible for everyone." Then the CD leads listeners through their first encounter with meditation. Progressively longer sessions help increase focus. The program trains listeners to concentrate on one specific physical sensation during meditation so their thoughts don't wander.

"There are instructions and encouragement sprinkled throughout," says Chemel. "A person can get their feet wet and feel they've got a guide right with them." Beyond meditation, Chemel says, "there are also optional guided relaxation exercises for those looking for something easier to do – five to 10 minutes for a quick relaxation experience."

Soon, they're ready for the full-length 20-minute meditation, with three background options (silence, nature sounds, or Eastern flute music). "They're actually cued as to when to begin, told to let the CD play, and they'll be instructed as to when the session is over."

Chemel and his co-authors have done their best to make meditation easy, but they've also included all the information curious users will need, including a full audio manual "with questions about meditation, background information, the history of meditation... how the scientific community became intrigued by its benefits. Everything in these three CDs is there so that anyone can access it."

A guidance counsellor in a Jewish high school, Chemel believes meditation's benefits transcend stereotypes of age and lifestyle. From teenagers to middle-aged professionals and seniors, or for those with health problems – the program includes the option to lie down – meditation helps develop a positive attitude, lower blood pressure, control racing thoughts, and recognize defeating, negative or anxious thoughts.

"In our society, we focus on what we say, on what we do, but not our thoughts. We don't necessarily realize we have the ability to control our thoughts... Through meditation, one begins to get control back in... deciding what kinds of thoughts to accept."

Doctors and therapists can confidently recommend health-based meditation regardless of clients' religion and time commitments. "Before, [they] didn't really have anything other than a couple of complicated medical-based programs that involved tremendous discipline and commitment. For your average person who doesn't have a lot of time, our program is something quick and easy."

Clinic takes multidisciplinary approach to sleep problems

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

When Dr. Adam Moscovitch first dabbled in sleep disorders some 25 years ago, he wanted to explore the relationship between sleep problems and mood disorders.

Dr. Adam Moscovitch

"I had an interest in seasonal affective disorder, and research showed there was a connection between sleep deprivation and depression."

But once the Calgary-trained psychiatrist delved further, he discovered that sleep deprivation is a complex sub-specialty.

"I was very excited about this field. There are more than 80 different sleep disorders."

He went on do a three-year fellowship at Stanford University before returning to Calgary to set up the Canadian Sleep Institute.

Three years ago, Moscovitch, "moved to Toronto for love," as he puts it," and today he heads the Somni Sleep Clinic (491 Bathurst St., Suite 203, 416-784-1430) and is the acting senior consultant for several sleep labs in the GTA.

He stresses that a disorder is not an occasional sleep disturbance, but rather a sleep problem that persists over several months. "It has a significant impact on one's physical, psychological, educational or occupational functioning."

The Somni clinic offers a multidisciplinary approach to figuring out an individual's sleep problem.

"We look at physical, environmental and psychological causes," he says.

"We can address the problem following an assessment. There are usually three or four different things contributing to the individual's problem."

He says there's an overlap between sleep problems and depression and anxiety disorders, as well as chronic pain conditions such as fibromyalgia.

According to Moscovitch, sleep disorders connected to insomnia are also common among people who do shift work or who work long hours.

He says that through his clinical research in occupational sleep disorders, he has become a leading expert in fatigue management in workplaces that provide transportation services or are shift-work facilities.

"In our 24/7 society, the importance of managing fatigue can have serious implications on productivity and safety."

Sleep apnea, a breathing problem that interrupts sleep, is the most common condition studied in the sleep lab, he says.

"Sleep apnea disrupts breathing several hundred times a night. A person may not have a clue that they have the condition, although they may be aware that they snore."

Some consequences of sleep apnea include sleepiness, memory problems, irritability, and falling asleep during the day, but ultimately a person with untreated apnea is at risk for cardiac complications, he says.

While obesity is a common risk factor for sleep apnea, the condition manifests itself in other situations.

A jaw structure with a receding chin, large tonsils and nasal stuffiness can cause sleep apnea, says Moscovitch, noting that there is a greater incidence of sleep apnea in kids now that fewer tonsillectomies are performed in childhood.

"You can even see apnea in infancy."

Pediatric sleep apnea can affect a child's performance at school, he adds

People with sleep apnea often get a special sleep mask that keeps their airways open all night so they can have a more restful sleep, or they can be treated with a dental appliance, depending on the severity of the condition, he says.

Treatment for a sleep disorder is often multi-pronged, Moscovitch says, pointing out that symptoms of a sleep disorder can include difficulty falling asleep, staying asleep or waking up early or a combination of all these symptoms.

Treatment involves assessing underlying the condition, identifying the causes and tailoring the treatment, he explains.

Sometimes the plan entails shifting a person's body clock. Behaviour therapies may also be applicable to various sleep-related problems.

Sometimes medication is required.

"In most cases, the use of medication should be a temporary measure," says Moscovitch. "In 10 to 15 per cent of cases, we accept the long-term use of medication."

Israel keeps close eye on Syria

Joshua Davidovich
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel is keeping a close eye on Syria and will act if it sees any indication that weapons are being transferred to Hezbollah, military experts said in an interview published Saturday.

A reported Israeli attack on a Syrian weapons convoy could be only the first volley in a series of upcoming strikes against Damascus and Hezbollah if the embattled regime tries to transfer weapons to the Lebanese terror group, former military intelligence head Amos Yadlin told the Washington Post.

"Any time Israel will have reliable intelligence that this is going to be transferred from Syria to Lebanon, it will act," the paper reported Yadlin saying.

He added the caveat that the decision to strike would still be made on a case-by-case basis.

Hezbollah has reportedly been preparing for the possibility of more attacks, the pan-Arab London-based daily al-Quds al-Arabi reported last Friday, citing an increase in Israeli fighter jets flying over southern Lebanese airspace and carrying out "mock raids."

Rabbi David Hartman (1931-2013)

Educator, activist dies at 81

Stuart Winer
Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Rabbi David Hartman, founder of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem and the first rabbi of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem in Montreal, died Sunday at the age of 81 after succumbing to a long illness.

Funeral services were held Monday morning at the institute, followed by his burial in the Har Menuchot cemetery.

Rabbi Hartman was a leading thinker among philosophers of contemporary Judaism and an internationally renowned Jewish author.

Born in 1931 in the Brownsville section of Brooklyn, N.Y., Rabbi Hartman attended Yeshiva Rabbi Chaim Berlin and the Lubavitch Yeshiva.

In 1953, having studied with Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, he received his rabbinical ordination from Yeshiva University in New York. He continued to study with Rabbi Soloveitchik until 1960, while pursuing a graduate degree in philosophy with Robert C. Pollock at Fordham University.

Mogul Remembered

CALGARY — Real estate mogul Jack Singer, who once bought filmmaker Francis Ford Coppola's ailing Zoetrope Studios at auction, was remembered Feb. 5 at his funeral at Calgary's Beth Tzedec Synagogue. Singer, who died Feb. 2 at 95, built an empire that included more than one million square feet of office space in downtown Calgary, as well as thousands of apartments and land in Western Canada and the United States. He bought Coppola's studio for $12.3 million in 1984. His son, Alan, still runs what's now called Hollywood Center Studios. Singer became involved in Hollywood in 1981 when he loaned Coppola $3 million to finish the film One From the Heart, a flop that sank Zoetrope.

More Jail Time

MONTREAL — One of two men who took part in attacks on two Jewish institutions was sent back to jail last week for breaking conditions, trespassing and uttering threats. Omar Bulphred, now 27, pleaded guilty to firebombing the chassidic Skver community's Toldos Yakov Yosef school in 2006 and trying to ignite an explosive outside the Snowdon YM-YMHA in 2007. No one was hurt in either incident. He was released last June and pledged to keep the peace, but in July, he was charged with trespassing, uttering threats and breaking his conditions for peeking into homes and threatening one of the owners, the Gazette reported. He pleaded guilty. His lawyer said he suffers from Asperger's syndrome.

Teen Honoured For Subway Rescue

OTTAWA — Gov.-Gen. David Johnston awarded a Star of Courage last Friday to a Toronto teen who saved himself and a friend from death after a mentally unstable man pushed them into the path of an oncoming subway train.

Asaf Shargall

Asaf Shargall, then 14, and friend Jacob Greenspon, who turned 15 that day, were on the platform at Dufferin station in February 2009 when a man shoved them onto the tracks just as a train was entering the station.

Shargall took cover in a small alcove, but rushed back out to pull his friend into the secure location as the train rolled past. Both survived, although Greenspon, son of then-Globe and Mail editor Ed Greenspon, later had two damaged toes amputated. Shargall sustained minor injuries.

The man, then 47, was found to be not criminally responsible because of a mental disorder. He had tried to push a third boy, a friend of the other two, onto the tracks, but he managed to keep his balance and not fall.

The three teens and two other friends were heading home after playing paintball to celebrate Greenspon's birthday that day.

WORLD

French Attacks

MARSEILLE — A 20-year-old Jewish man wearing a Star of David pendant was mugged and robbed twice outside Marseille's main train station. Two men on a scooter approached him Feb. 4 outside the station and one tore the golden chain from his neck. They called him a "dirty Jew" before fleeing, with one of the men carrying the pendant. A group of young men nearby then approached and hurled anti-semitic insults at the victim before stealing an MP3 player and 100 euros. They also reportedly hit the man. Police were treating the case not only as a robbery but as an antisemitic attack.

France saw a 45 per cent increase in antisemitic incidents in the eight months after the attack at Ohr Hatorah school in Toulouse, where an Islamist radical murdered four people last March, although relatively few in Marseille. Meanwhile, a knife-wielding woman, 51, was arrested Feb. 5 after threatening a 16-year-old boy outside the same Toulouse school.

Leo Baeck launches tuition subsidies

Up to $5,000 per student of eligible families

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Leo Baeck Day School has announced a tuition subsidy of up to $5,000 per student to middle-income families who find the cost of day school daunting, but don't qualify for tuition subsidies.

The one-year pilot project, dubbed AlephBaeck, will be available for 40 to 60 new students entering the school's Thornhill campus in September.

The first of its kind at a Jewish day school in Ontario, it will be funded by a one-time gift from an anonymous donor.

Day school affordability is "a major issue," Eric Petersiel, head of school, told The CJN.

At the North American Jewish Day School conference Feb. 3 to 5, which Petersiel attended in Washington, D.C., tuition affordability was "a topic of every conversation," he said.

"Jewish day school gets better and better, and fewer people can afford it," Petersiel added.

According to Petersiel, in Canada, only Montreal has a program that helps middle-income families with Jewish day school tuition. It's a community-wide program, he said.

Leo Baeck, Toronto's only Reform day school, is defining "middle income" as between $150,000 and $250,000 for parents with one child. If parents have two children at the school, middle income rises to between $200,000 and $300,000; then to between $250,000 and $350,000 for families with three or more children at the school.

Families can receive the full $5,000 in their child's third year if they commit to three years at the school. If they take the amount in the first year, it drops to $3,000, and $4,000 if they take it in the second year.

AlephBaeck is debuting in Thornhill, because the school has a higher percentage of middle-income families there than it does at its branch on Arlington Avenue, south of Eglinton Avenue, Petersiel said.

Israel has lost a teacher

Rabbi David Hartman

From the editor's desk...

Some years ago, a group of journalists visiting Israel under the auspices of the American Jewish Press Association, dropped in on Rabbi David Hartman at the institute he founded in the name of his father, Shalom Hartman, in the peaceful and lovely German Colony neighbourhood of Jerusalem.

The institute, founded in 1976, was already deeply entrenched in the Jewish world as a rare academy of study, learning, the respectful exchange of ideas and an overarching commitment to mankind's betterment.

It warmly welcomed the flint and spark of heartfelt debate even as it welcomed the many inquisitive, seeking debaters who came to its elegant premises from all over the world.

The visiting group consisted of 20 reporters and editors from North America, all but one, American.

Not surprisingly, there was a wide disparity among us in our respective levels of knowledge about Judaism, Jewish history, Israel and Israeli history. But we shared in common the "mission" of our work, namely, trying to inform and perhaps even to educate the wide range of humanity that comprised our readership.

It was this mission that Rabbi Hartman seized upon and emphasized when he spoke to us. We were "filters," he said, through which the news of Israel was visible and understandable to our readers. As a result, he emphasized, our responsibility was one of truth, if not always clarity. He urged us to be honest, courageous, principled and as well-informed as possible.

He sat at the front of the room, clearly suffering from pain in his back, answering our many questions. Not all questions sparkled with insight. Nevertheless, Rabbi Hartman responded politely, patiently, courteously, wholeheartedly.

History had invested all of us, he suggested, with the task of building an authentically Jewish society in Israel and fostering the development and growth of authentically Jewish individuals, based upon faith and tradition, in a country that disqualified no one for his or her differences.

The end of our meeting with Rabbi Hartman was genuinely sad for most of us. We wished we could prolong our visit, even by a few minutes. But that was impossible given his physical discomfort.

All of us in the group knew we had been uniquely privileged to sit with and talk to a very special individual. It was quickly evident that Rabbi Hartman was a scholar, theologian, philosopher and essayist. But, first and foremost, he was a teacher.

And a doer.

Inspired by the events of 1967 and by his abiding belief that human beings must act on earth to bring about God's heavenly will for His creations, Rabbi Hartman moved his family from Montreal to Jerusalem in 1971 to join in the paradigmatic Jewish aspiration of building Zion and perfecting the world.

That was the last time I saw Rabbi David Hartman.

The news last Sunday of his death brought an abrupt, lingering jolt of sorrow and grief, even though his ill health was widely known.

In 1999, Rabbi Hartman wrote A Heart of Many Rooms: Celebrating the Many Voices within Judaism. The book took its title from a talmudic teaching: "So make yourself a heart of many rooms and bring into it the words of the House of Shammai and the words of the House of Hillel." It was dedicated to the pre-eminence of inclusion, empathy, understanding and tolerance within the Jewish People as a paramount value of life.

In the preface of the book, Rabbi Hartman made plain his hope for life in Israel: "In spite of the growth of militant fanaticism, I still cherish the conviction that a committed halachic Jew need not feel threatened by different understandings and interpretations of normative Judaism. A Heart of Many Rooms expresses my continuing belief in the possibility and necessity of building educational bridges between different sectors of the population in Israel and throughout the Jewish world. If we fail to build these bridges, we are in danger of splitting Israeli society and of creating sectarian forms of Judaism in the Diaspora."

Israel has lost a teacher. Many have lost a teacher and a friend. Rabbi Hartman's family, of course, lost much more. May God comfort his family as He must also comfort Clal Yisrael.

Rabbi Hartman's memory will surely be for blessing – strength, inspiration, courage and dedication to a life of ethics, justice and loving-kindness.

Israeli flag vandalized at York's Multicultural Week

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Hillel at York is praising York University for condemning the vandalism of an Israeli flag that was part of a display for the university's Multicultural Week.

On Feb. 7, one day before the closing ceremonies of the event, which celebrates diversity at York, representatives of the university's security service told Hillel they took down an Israeli flag that had been draped over a railing in York's student centre alongside flags from around the world after discovering it was covered in red paint, said Tamara Caplan, Hillel at York's director.

In a statement that was mass emailed to the York community, the university said it supports freedom of expression and peaceful discussion, but the vandalism went too far.

"York University is unwavering: this type of conduct is unacceptable, is contrary to our values and will not be tolerated. Toronto Police Service was immediately contacted and we are currently supporting their investigation," said the statement, signed by Rhonda Lenton, vice-president (academic) and provost, and Janet Morrison, vice-provost (students).

Caplan called the vandalism especially disappointing, given that it happened near the end of what was otherwise a successful Multicultural Week.

The initiative is organized by the York Federation of Students (YFS), the school's undergraduate student union.

"We participated in a lot of events this year, and the reception we received was amazing," Caplan said, explaining that this year, Hillel highlighted Judaism in Morocco. "That's why it was such a shame... The students who organized it felt really welcomed in the community."

Hillel released a statement thanking both the administration and York security for responding quickly to the vandalism.

In the release, Jessica Cherkasov, president of York Students for Israel, which is affiliated with Hillel, said that her group replaced the flag shortly after the vandalized one was removed to stress that pro-Israel students will "not be intimidated by such cowardly acts."

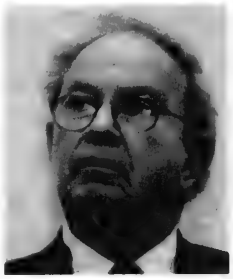
Kwinter becomes Ontario's oldest-ever MPP at 82

Andy Levy-Azjenkopf
Staff Reporter

Provincial governments come and go, but there's been one constant at Queen's Park for the past 28 years – Monte Kwinter.

On Jan. 26, the York Centre Liberal MPP officially became the province's oldest-ever serving member of the legislature. He'll be 82 on March 22.



Monte Kwinter

First elected in 1985 at the already-seasoned age of 55 in the vote that ultimately saw David Peterson become premier, Kwinter won the North York riding of Wilson Heights, defeating incumbent Progressive Conservative David Rotenberg and New Democrat Howard Moscoe. He's retained the seat ever since, most recently against Tory Michael Mostyn in the 2011 Ontario election.

Along the way, Kwinter served in three different ministerial portfolios under Peterson from 1985 to 1990, and between 2003 and 2007, he was premier Dalton McGuinty's minister of community safety and correctional services.

And he's far from done, he said.

Claiming that he retains all the vigour and energy he had when he was younger, Kwinter said he still feels a great sense of commitment and opportunity to "do good" for his constituents and the province, and he confirmed he'll run again in the next election.

"I can make a difference. As long as I feel that way, I am motivated," he said. "I get to the office every day by 8 a.m. and keep a full schedule. I'm not slowing down."

Prior to running for elected office, Kwinter owned a real estate firm and was vice-president of the Ontario College of Art. He also earned a degree in industrial design.

And he's proud of his Jewish heritage, having been raised in Ontario, the son of Polish-Jewish immigrants.

Kwinter said he's made no secret of his religion wherever he's gone. Recounting one story of leading a mission of Ukrainian Ontarians to Kiev, he said he purposely told the mayor's office that he's Jewish. In return, the mayor offered to give him a personal tour of Babi Yar. On the tour, Kwinter said he mentioned how he couldn't believe there was no memorial at the site to the victims of the infamous Nazi massacre there.

He found out later that his remarks had an impact on the mayor, who ordered a memorial built on the site shortly after Kwinter's visit.

Kwinter also helped start an annual tradition at Queen's Park during McGuinty's tenure honouring Holocaust survivors living in Ontario. Since 2003, survivors have been brought to the legislature to receive certificates from the province and tell their stories. The ceremony is held in affiliation with the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

The octogenarian politician also has a long-held objection to the province's funding of Catholic schools, but not other faith-based ones, and it's in stark contrast with his own party's position on the issue.

"I'm not a proponent of fully funded religious schools, but there is an inequity," he said.

Kwinter voted against his own party on the issue in the past, siding with the Conservative opposition when McGuinty's government moved to repeal the previous Tory regime's tax credits for parents who send their children to non-Catholic faith-based schools.

Asked whether he might bring the subject up again with the new premier, Kathleen Wynne, Kwinter called it a "dead issue" that no one will touch, considering its divisiveness and toxic electoral effect on anyone raising it at Queen's Park.

He said he'll work with Wynne to lead her and relevant cabinet ministers and businesspeople on future missions to Israel, as he has in the past.

Kwinter helped organize McGuinty's 2010 visit to the Holy Land, which resulted in numerous deals being signed between Ontario and Israel in the realms of brain research, science, green technology and renewable energy.

And he's become the ultimate repository of "institutional memory" Queen's Park and a frequent mentor to up-and-coming MPPs.

Regarding the recent Liberal leadership race and eventual victory by Wynne over her main challenger, Sandra Pupatello, Kwinter said he never endorsed either candidate, because both are equally capable and "it would have been like choosing between two of my kids."

But speaking to The CJN last week as Wynne was finalizing her new cabinet, Kwinter said he'd be open to holding a ministerial post if asked.

"My energy hasn't let up one bit," he said about whether the demands of cabinet at his age would be too daunting. "I wouldn't say 'no.'"

Summit on education

For many years, the elephant in the room of communal Jewish life has been the cost of Jewish education. Tuition fees at Jewish day schools are deplorably and often quite impossibly high for the vast majority of young families. This is especially the case in Ontario, where the provincial government contributes nothing to the non-religious portion of private Jewish day schools. But it is also true in Quebec, where, even with governmental assistance, the tuition costs are severely prohibitive for most young people.

As if exhausted by the many valiant but failed efforts over the years – again, especially in Ontario – to help reduce the cost of Jewish education, the community is no longer even publicly discussing the situation. The elephant sits in the middle of our lives, uncorralled, adversely affecting our future.

But the silence is unacceptable. It is an abrogation of the collective community responsibility that was, not so long ago, the zealously implemented first priority of community leaders. It sends an unmistakable message to young parents that the community is indifferent and uncaring regarding the Jewish education of their children. It shouts, frankly, of community defeat. We must, therefore, break the silence, point to and rein in the elephant and at the very least, publicly resume the discussion. Three events in quick succession over the past two weeks provide the impetus for doing so. They are further compelling evidence that the subject is, and always will be, a high public priority.

In Las Vegas, billionaire Sheldon Adelson and his wife, Miriam, donated $50 million to the three Jewish day schools that comprise the Adelson Education Campus. The schools serve some 600 students from preschool to high school. In Toronto, the Leo Baeck Day School announced a unique tuition subsidy initiative of up to $5,000 per student for eligible families. In Montreal, the Jewish People's and Peretz Schools and the Bialik High School in Montreal (JPPS/Bialik) announced a new policy of tuition reduction and freezes.

All three initiatives are aimed at preventing parents from removing their children from school and bringing new students into the schools. We commend the initiatives and their originators. However, a wider, more comprehensive, more imaginative, wall-to-wall, community solution is necessary to ensure that as many parents as possible can afford to provide a Jewish education to their children.

As a first step in devising such a strategy, we call upon our communal leaders to convene a summit meeting about Jewish education. The summit would examine Jewish education in all its future possibilities and would involve as wide a swath of concerned individuals as possible: businesspeople, academics, educators, policy-makers, parents, grandparents, industrialists, philanthropists, clergy, lay leaders and any one else with wisdom or experience to offer on the subject.

The status quo is an affront to conscience. We owe this search for solutions as much to our parents and our grandparents as to our children and our grandchildren. Inaction is not an option. Community leaders must remove the elephant immediately.

Absurd position on Israeli election

Many political columnists have suggested that the one reason why Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu lost a number of seats in the recent Israeli election is the fact that he made little effort to re-engage with the Palestinians on peace talks. The absurdity of this position is that the only precondition that Israel has placed on reopening peace talks is that the Palestinian Authority recognize the existence of a Jewish state. This, the president of the Palestinian Authority has consistently refused to do. Add to that the publicly stated position of Hamas, the rulers of Gaza who are soon to be reunited with the PA, that Israel must be wiped off the face of the Earth and that Palestinians are entitled to every inch of the State of Israel. It is ludicrous to suggest with that mindset that there is any point in Israel meeting with the PA. There is not one nation on Earth that would negotiate with a group publicly committed to destroying its population.

No preconditions

Smadari Meiri dismisses my reference to UN Security Council Resolution 242, which calls for "every state in the area to live in peace within secure and recognized borders free from threats and acts of violence" by noting that subsequent to the 1967 Six Day War, Israel promised to return areas of captured land in return for defensible borders and recognition as a sovereign state (Letters, Jan. 31).

Meiri should remember that on Sept. 1, 1967, 13 Arab states responded to such an Israeli offer with three nos: no peace, no recognition, no negotiations. As recently as Nov. 28, 2010, the "moderates" of Fatah formulated the three nos of Ramallah: no to Israel as a Jewish state, no to interim borders, no to land swaps.

Meiri asks what has Israel done since 1967, other than build settlements and vandalize Palestinian properties. Israel returned the Sinai to Egypt for a cold peace that is quickly thawing into a hot problem. The leader of Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood government, Mohamed Morsi, who refers to Jews as bloodsuckers, warmongers and descendants of apes and pigs, does not sound like a good partner for peace.

Israel returned Gaza and received an ongoing barrage of rockets in return. One can only imagine the predicament that Israel would be in had it returned the Golan Heights. With the Iron Dome, land once again becomes a vital component as a security buffer. Peace will only be possible when the Palestinians appreciate its value and sit down with Israel for direct talks without preconditions.

Diversity of Israeli opinion

Kudos to The CJN for reporting the remarks of the leading Israeli academic Hanan Alexander, who said, "Israel will benefit from criticism" ("'Abandon romantic fantasies' of Israel: prof," Jan 31). Despite being told by our communal leaders not to criticize the Netanyahu government, and despite Israeli NGOs and political parties other than Likud being described as "fringe radicals" or even "terrorists," the paper has shown courage in impartially reporting the real diversity of Israeli opinion.

Anshel Wise helped her family

I am writing in response to the SeeJN photograph with the caption headed "Anshel Wise's cigar store and steamship office" (Jan. 31). My father, Louis Goldberg, came to Canada in 1924, leaving his wife and four children in Poland. After working for one year, he found himself short of cash and could not afford to bring his family to Canada. Anshel Wise became aware of this and lent him the remainder of the money interest-free. My father did in fact bring my mother and siblings back as a result of his generosity. My father paid the loan back and remained a faithful client of Wise's for the rest of his life. Wise was an exceptionally generous, outstanding man.

In the shadow of Operation Exodus

Dov Harris

Operation Exodus – the effort to help Jews leave the former Soviet Union (FSU) – has long been regarded as the epitome of what happens when Jews are united in a singular cause that speaks to our values, our care for one another and that also encapsulates a transcendent universal message.

The temptation to compare Operation Exodus to the biblical Exodus was understandably irresistible, with its rallying cry of "Let our People go" and seeing with our own eyes the "ingathering of the exiles," but again, naturally enough, there was some cherry-picking to maintain a momentum of success.

For a more complete narrative that invites an even closer parallel between the two exoduses, consideration should also be given to some comparisons that are less flattering yet are teaching moments for the ages.

One such comparison that this essay will attempt to elucidate is virtually a case study of history repeating itself by contrasting an encounter that befell our ancestors in the Sinai desert with our present-day treatment of the most vulnerable of our brethren in the FSU.

Among the programs provided by the JDC to Jews of the FSU, are educational and welfare initiatives involving the old and the young, above, and bringing food to needy families, above right. (Photos courtesy of the JDC)

As the Jewish People began their journey to the Promised Land, they formed columns, with the strong at the front leaving the weak, unable to keep up with the pace, bringing up the rear. It was an egregious error, for it exposed a vulnerable flank to the enemy.

Their very first encounter with hostile tribes was the marauding Amalek, who "smote the hindmost of thee even all that were feeble behind thee, where thou was faint and weary" (Deuteronomy, 25, 17-19). For this perfidious attack, we are enjoined to destroy Amalek wherever we find him, not excluding ourselves.

Amalek is not only the murderous antagonist to be destroyed from without. He is also the destructive urge from within that must be destroyed, the urge that is deaf to the cries of the powerless and blind to their travails, the urge the People of Israel succumbed to when they left the weakest behind, – the elderly, the lame and the sick.

We, too, seem to be similarly distracted.

Lying in the shadow of Operation Exodus untouched by the glow of its success, a vast Jewish calamity has gripped thousands of Jews in the FSU. Living life at its extremes, ravaged by poverty, they are the community who remained behind.

The depth of poverty this essay wishes to convey will inevitably fall short of its harrowing nature. When thousands of our people have to make the decision between food and medication, who of us can possibly put ourselves in their shoes? But what lifts their situation to an existential level of self-questioning beyond our concern for fellow beings is how it is possible when we have the resources to lift so many Jewish lives from the grosser indignities of poverty that we fail to do so.

When one-third of our people were taken from us in the most bestial fashion possible, surely the expectation would be that every Jewish life has an added dimension of preciousness, including those possessing no obvious utility other than to return the warmth of an embrace when given the chance?

But in order to act, we must be aware. And in this respect, we have been poorly served by our leadership, though not all the blame rests with them. When all we need to know is a click away in this hyper-connected world, with whom should we remonstrate? Why don't we just click to get the facts?

Our reluctance may well lie in the direction taken in the $60-million budget of our most formidable federation, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, where $350,000, less than 0.6 per cent, is allocated to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), the lead organization on the front lines battling poverty in the FSU. That percentage, incidentally, is larger than for any other federation in Canada. Even adding ancillary campaigns such as the Global Seder, the percentage of funds allocated to the JDC by all Canadian Jewish federations is less than 1 per cent.

No more powerful message need be sent to contributors that extreme poverty in the FSU does not make the grade as a priority program.

The rationale is clear.

When set against other pressing issues such as securing a Jewish future for our children, the needs of the elderly Jewish poor in our local community and support for Israel, the profile of the poor in the FSU fades to the margins.

The reality is that local needs are primary. Understandably, the poor in our community should get top billing. But if we also assume that a Jewish life anywhere is as dear to us as a Jewish life at home, shouldn't appropriate support be directed to those in extreme need no matter where they live? None of the poor in our community live the marginalised lives of thousands of elderly in the FSU. There is simply no comparison.

It's a point driven home by a report from Brandeis University's Maurice and Marilyn Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies titled Hardship and Needs of Elderly Hesed Clients: An analysis of clients served by Hesed service centers in Russia and Ukraine. Published in November 2012 and available online, it's an objective analysis that contrasts life for an elderly Jew living in poverty in the West to an elderly Jew living in the FSU.

It cannot be denied that even if federations in Canada doubled the percentage of their transfers to the JDC to 1.5 per cent of all funds raised (or approximately $1.3 million), it would not solve the problem of extreme poverty and would perhaps be characterized as an exercise in futility. But consider that for the recipients of the additional assistance, it would be anything but futile! Should we not settle for this as a beginning?

And should this sum strain federation budgets, why would we not consider a separate annual campaign promoted at a level matching the need? Have our contributors ever failed the Jewish People when given the facts? Would they not hear the cries of the powerless? Would they be blind to their travails?

It all comes down to a basic question: how are we to understand the scandal of poverty among our elderly in the FSU – as an indictment of a people who looked the other way as our forbears did in the desert, inviting Amalek to do his bidding, or as an opportunity to redress a terrible wrong now decades in the making?

Have we already given the answer by persisting with the status quo? Are we the generation who without putting pen to paper has written its epitaph on Operation Exodus as an incomplete legacy forever tarnished by our indifference?

Jewish Italian parliamentarian quits politics

JTA

ROME — Jewish Italian politician Fiamma Nirenstein, vice-president of the committee on foreign affairs in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, the lower house of Italy's parliament, has announced that she is quitting politics.

Nirenstein, who is returning to her journalism career, said she will be making aliyah and plans to apply for Israeli citizenship. "Everybody can see that unfortunately antisemitism is still growing worldwide, and Israel is the only warm homeland for the Jewish People," she told the Italian newspaper Il Giornale.

Born in 1946 in Florence, Nirenstein has written many articles and books on the Jewish People, antisemitism and Israel. She is known in Italy and Europe for fighting terrorism and racism, as well as for her efforts to get the European Union and the Italian government to ban Hezbollah and Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corps within the EU's territories and to officially list them as terrorist organizations. She is also chairwoman of the International Council of Jewish Parliamentarians.

Fiamma Nirenstein

"Israel is today the best country able to offer culture, sociality, democracy, morality, a country where people adopted a lifestyle simple and natural," and where its people are united as a family in "their fight for survival, and in their great love for their country... Love for life in Israel is everywhere," she said.

In related news, antisemitic incidents in Britain rose five per cent over the previous year, making 2012 the third-worst year on record.

The Community Service Trust, British Jewry's security unit, reported that there were 640 reported antisemitic incidents, compared to 608 in 2011.

Sixty of the incidents were classified as "violent antisemitic assaults." The majority of the incidents, however, included verbal attacks and graffiti. Social media also was a source of many of the incidents.

In Hungary, manwhile, antisemitism is causing an influx of Jewish immigrants to Austria, the head of Vienna's Jewish community said.

Ariel Muzicant, a former leader of Austria's Jewish community of approximately 8,000, told JTA that his community has begun offering assistance to Hungarian Jews wishing to leave. The community is now assisting some 20 families that are either in Hungary and preparing to leave or newly arrived in Vienna.

Two mayors, two Jewish experiences

His gravestone, like his life, evokes the complexities of the Jewish experience in America. Born a few years before the Great Depression to parents who had come to the United States from Poland, former New York City mayor Ed Koch's life exemplified the roller coaster ride of an immigrant family pursuing the American dream. He rose from the poverty of the Depression era to political power and stature. His family integrated into American culture, but maintained a strong identification with their Jewish heritage. A decorated infantryman during World War II, Koch was deeply affected by the Holocaust. He remained in Germany after the war to assist in the denazification process.

One of only three New York mayors to serve three terms, Koch is credited with reinvigorating the city, bringing it out of bankruptcy. Not without controversy, he came down hard on crime and grime. In the days after his death, as reflections and reminiscences filled the media, certain words were repeatedly used to describe him: outspoken, combative, canny, opinionated, blunt, brash and prickly. In a videotaped interview with the New York Times conducted five years ago and released after his death, he was more succinct: "I'm just this little Jewish kid from the Bronx!"

Asked in the interview about his legacy, he responded: "I want to be remembered as a proud Jew who loved the people of the city of New York and did his best to make their lives better." His burial site exemplifies the complicated relationship among those commitments. He elected to be buried in Trinity Cemetery rather than in a Jewish cemetery, and for the most New York of reasons: location. Trinity is in the heart of Manhattan. Almost as a counterbalance, inscribed as an epitaph on his tombstone are the last words of murdered journalist Daniel Pearl, "My father is Jewish, my mother is Jewish, I am Jewish." Below that appears the assertion that Koch was "fiercely proud of his Jewish faith," "fiercely defended" New York City, and that he "loved his country."

Koch was not the first Jewish mayor of New York. He succeeded Abe Beame, another child of Polish immigrants. But as I thought about Koch's individualized and complex negotiations of identity and values, I was reminded of yet another mayor who exemplified a different set of circumstances in the Jewish experience.

Like Koch, Fiorello LaGuardia served for three terms, from 1934 to 1945. LaGuardia's parents, too, immigranted to the United States, in his case from Italy in the late 1800s. Like Koch, LaGuardia was from the Bronx, and both graduated from the same law school (although decades apart). Although LaGuardia's mother was a Jew from Trieste – a descendant of the prestigious Luzzatto family of scholars, rabbis, and poets – Fiorello and his sister, Gemma, were raised as Episcopalians. The family made frequent visits to Trieste, an important centre of Jewish life for centuries. Around the turn of the century, the family moved back to Italy, although Fiorello returned to New York.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

As mayor of New York, LaGuardia was among the earliest outspoken critics of Hitler and National Socialism. As early as 1934, he warned against the threat that the Nazis posed to Jews. His sister, Gemma, who had remained in Italy, married a Hungarian Jewish man, and they eventually moved to Budapest. The Gestapo arrested Gemma and her husband soon after the German invasion of Hungary and transported them to Mauthausen. Because of her brother's position, Gemma was seen as a potentially valuable political hostage. Gemma was transferred to the women's camp, Ravensbrück. Although, like her brother, Gemma didn't think of herself as Jewish, she wore the yellow star on her clothing.

After the war, Gemma was reunited with her daughter and young grandson who, it turned out, had also been in Ravensbrück. Eventually, she learned that her husband had not survived Mauthausen. I first learned of Gemma LaGuardia Gluck's story when I visited Ravensbrück in the mid-1990s. Her memoir, originally published in 1961, was reissued in 2007, edited by Rochelle Saidel, who has researched the Jewish prisoners of Ravensbrück.

LaGuardia and Koch make an interesting pairing: one not Jewish but swept into Jewish history by virtue of family and conscience, the other, flamboyantly Jewish, embracing Jewish history in his own eclectic way.

Israel's post-election agenda

Israel's new government is in the process of being formed. When you read this, it may already be in place. In a talk in Jerusalem last month, Toronto-born veteran journalist Jim Lederman suggested three priorities for the prime minister: next year's budget, electoral reform and conscription for haredim and Arabs.

First, the reason why Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu advanced the elections was probably because he knew the next budget would entail punishing cuts in public spending. By going to the polls before bringing the bad news, he may have hoped to save his political skin.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Though he's still at the helm, the elections cost him dearly. Of the 31 mandates for the combined list of Likud and Yisrael Beiteinu, only 20 belong to the former, one more than newcomer Yair Lapid's Yesh Atid party and seven less than Netanyahu's Likud had before the vote.

Finance ministers court unpopularity in hard times. Former Labor cabinet member Ophir Paz Pines, writing in Ha'aretz soon after the election, urged Lapid not to take the portfolio. His stated reason was Lapid's inexperience, but he may also have had in mind the pitfalls.

Someone will have to bite the bullet, which will be particularly difficult after the unexpected resignation of Stanley Fisher, the universally admired governor of the Bank of Israel.

Second, there's a growing realization in Israel that something must be done to bring about electoral reform. Until now, most parties have resisted changing the present system, fearing it will work against them. The influence now gained by Lapid and his apparent embrace of bold ideas may nevertheless force a change.

Though Canada's first-past-the-post system disenfranchises many voters, it makes for stable government. By contrast, Israel's proportional representation system is probably more democratic, but it makes governing much more difficult. Hence the protracted and tortuous coalition negotiations, with their concomitant horse trading.

A combination of the two systems may be the answer. Israel could be divided into 60 ridings. The candidate with the most votes in each would represent it in the Knesset. The other 60 would be chosen by proportional representation.

Whether or not the parties in power would support electoral reform for the good of the country, rather than protect their own interests, will depend on the persistence of "the new kid on the block," Lapid.

Finally, although Lapid's campaign stressed the imperative for Israel's haredi and Arab citizens to serve in the army or do community service like everybody else, I understood Lederman to say that, despite the urgency, it should only come third on the government's agenda.

Army service for everybody is complicated, due to potential security risks in allowing all Arabs to serve as the Bedouin and the Druze do now, and because integrating those who now claim to be yeshiva students entails many practical obstacles.

The broad coalition Netanyahu envisages is likely to include the two haredi parties, Shas and Yahadut Hatorah. Both vehemently oppose army service for their boys and are determined to resist such legislation. The question is if Shas, always anxious to be in the government – and thus have easier access to public funds – will cave in.

However, the IDF itself may not be too keen to have to provide special facilities for haredi soldiers. Though a small number already serve, to conscript many more may cause headaches for army commanders.

Significantly, Lederman's order of priorities didn't include peace negotiations with the Palestinians. Although about two-thirds of Israelis are said to favour a two-state solution, most politicians have so far maintained that Israel has no Palestinian partner. The strong support for the settlements, reflected not only in the presence of the Habayit Hayehudi party but also in ideologies espoused by other lawmakers, remains a serious obstacle.

Even the Labor Party's election campaign concentrated on internal social issues, saying virtually nothing about peace. One of the few public figures to speak about it during the campaign was President Shimon Peres. Some saw it as deliberate criticism of the prime minister. But in his address when accepting Peres' offer to form the next government, Netanyahu did speak of his readiness to negotiate with the Palestinians.

Yet the real push to restart negotiations will probably have to come from U.S. President Barack Obama. There are signs that it's on the way.

Of course, because politics in general and Israeli politics in particular are fickle, the above "predictions" may turn out to be embarrassingly inaccurate.

Palestinian unity attempt flounders yet again

It's beginning to sound like a broken record.

For the past few years, Fatah and Hamas, the two rival factions in the Palestinian national movement, have tried in vain to create a single Palestinian government in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Since the collapse in 2007 of the short-lived Palestinian national unity government, formed as a result of the Mecca Agreement, Fatah, a secular organization, and Hamas, an Islamic fundamentalist group, have signed three reconciliation accords.

All of them have imploded, dashing hopes that the Palestinians can settle their differences.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Recently, Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi intervened in an attempt to broker a unity deal, inviting Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, and Khaled Meshal, a Hamas leader, to Cairo for talks.

They arrived in Egypt in the wake of significant developments in the Palestinian arena last November, December and January.

First, the United Nations granted the Palestinian Authority non-member observer status.

Second, Hamas and Israel fought an eight-day border war during which Israel bombarded targets in Gaza and Hamas fired rockets deep into Israel's heartland.

Third, Fatah and Hamas exchanged two goodwill gestures. Fatah allowed Hamas to stage a rally in the West Bank town of Nablus to mark the 25th anniversary of its founding. Hamas reciprocated by permitting Fatah to hold a rally in Gaza for the first time since the summer of 2007, when Hamas violently seized Gaza from Fatah in a mini civil war.

Following the Gaza rally, billed as a show of unity by both Fatah and Hamas, Fatah leader Nabil Shaath declared, "The climate is excellent for reconciliation." Responding to these overlapping events, Morsi invited the antagonists to send representatives to Cairo.

On the eve of their meeting, Marwan Barghouti, a leading Fatah figure serving five life sentences in an Israeli prison for his role in terrorist attacks against Israelis during the second intifadah, issued a statement from his cell imploring both sides to end their dispute. As he put it, "We need reconciliation now and without delay."

The discussions in Cairo focused on ways to implement a reconciliation accord signed in April 2011. No progress was reported, and Abbas and Meshal left Cairo empty-handed, leaving two separate and feuding Palestinian entities in place in the West Bank and Gaza.

The divisions that keep Fatah and Hamas constantly at odds are substantive.

Israel, of course, is a key sticking point. Fatah, a major component of the Palestinian Authority, has accepted Israel's existence within the pre-1967 armistice lines. Hamas rejects a two state solution and continues to call for armed struggle in a bid to create a single Palestinian state in place of Israel.

Toward the close of 2012, Ahmed Halabiyeh, head of Hamas' Jerusalem department, called upon Palestinians to launch a third uprising and resume suicide bombings against Israel.

At around the same time, Meshal, following a visit to Gaza, vowed that Hamas would never recognize Israel and try to "free the land of Palestine inch by inch."

Abbas, a moderate, has urged the Hamas leadership to recognize Israel, disavow terrorism and respect previous agreements signed by the Palestinian Authority and Israel. Hamas has balked, but has been amenable to observing a long-term truce with Israel.

Another area of contention turns on Hamas' armed wing, the Izz Al-Din Al-Qassem Brigades. Fatah has demanded its dismantlement, but Hamas has stoutly rejected this condition.

One of the thorniest issues yet to be resolved concerns the Palestinian Authority's security co-operation with Israel, sanctioned by the 1993 Oslo accords. Hamas staunchly opposes this partnership, which has been instrumental in quashing terrorist plots.

Fatah and Hamas are also at loggerheads over the issue of political arrests. Since their momentous falling out in June 2007, just months after the Mecca Agreement was signed and sealed, their respective security forces have been arresting each other's operatives in the West Bank and Gaza, contributing to an atmosphere of mutual bitterness.

Fatah and Hamas have also clashed over four internal issues, beginning with the question of who will lead a national unity government. Would it be Abbas, Yasser Arafat's designated successor? Or would it be Ismail Haniyeh, the prime minister of the Hamas regime in Gaza?

Remarkably enough, Fatah and Hamas cannot even agree when presidential and parliamentary elections should be held.

Nor have they been able to reach a consensus as to how the Palestine Liberation Organization – established in 1964 and universally recognized as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinians and currently led by Abbas – would be reconstituted.

Finally, Fatah and Hamas have yet to decide whether Hamas would be admitted into the PLO, and if so, what role it would then play in that umbrella organization.

These differences are not likely to be resolved within the foreseeable future, if indeed at all.

But as Fatah and Hamas struggle for primacy, Hamas appears to have gained the upper hand in the battle for hearts and minds in the West Bank and Gaza.

The reasons seem clear.

Although the Israeli Air Force battered Hamas in the last round of fighting, Hamas fought Israel to a virtual draw, thereby gaining street credit in Gaza and the West Bank. Under the terms of the ceasefire negotiated by Egypt and the United States, Israel eased its blockade of Gaza, a clear tactical victory for Hamas.

Khaled Meshal

On a strategic level, Hamas has become stronger now that the new Muslim Brotherhood government in Egypt has lined up firmly behind it. Morsi's predecessor, Hosni Mubarak, was hostile to Hamas and worked with Israel to keep Islamic fundamentalism in check.

Fatah, notwithstanding its success in upgrading its status at the United Nations, has grown correspondingly weaker. Although Abbas has renounced violence and clearly accepted Israel's existence, he has not made any real headway toward achieving Palestinian statehood. And due to a lack of funding from foreign donors, the Palestinian Authority government in the West Bank faces a dire financial crisis.

Israel's position on Palestinian unity seems contradictory.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has warned that a Palestinian unity agreement would put an end to a two-state solution. By the same token, Israel has observed that the split within Palestinian ranks jeopardizes the chances of peace. As Avigdor Lieberman, Israel's former foreign minister, noted, "We are ready to move forward, but we do not know who represents the Palestinians – Hamas or Fatah."

At present, this remains an unanswered question.

Agencies told to forge links with other groups

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community is compelled by Torah values to forge links with other ethnic groups, Rabbi Baruch Frydman Kohl told a recent conference hosted by JVS Toronto.

The day-long event, titled Building Bridges, showcased the cross-cultural initiatives of organizations with ethnic roots.

Glenys Lindenberg, vice-chair of the agency's board of directors, said the aim of the conference was to respond to the emerging needs of the broader community through collaboration with others, "and [to build] on our success in meeting the needs of the Jewish community."

The Jan. 31 conference, held at the Toronto Reference Library, heard a keynote address by Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation, as well as a panel discussion with community leaders.

Also at the conference, the first Building Bridges Innovation Award was presented to Mazon Canada for demonstrating leadership and innovation in building bridges with other communities.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said that Judaism has something precious to offer others, "and we have the obligation to carry that forward. [At the same time] we also benefit from the commonweal."

Presentation of the award to Ida McLaughlin, left, National Executive Director of MAZON Canada by Karen Goldenberg, former president and CEO of JVS Toronto

He said the Jewish community needs to build a broad bridge, "which is anchored in values that define our essence."

Community groups all share the same concerns about family, medical care, jobs, shelter, and care of the elderly, "just to name a few," he said. "We may differ in how we approach education and prayer, but we should respect the dignity of difference. The Torah tradition has core values that mandate us to build bridges to sustain others."

At the same time, the rabbi said, we have to maintain the Jewishness of our own agencies. "A high percentage of our funding now comes from government [sources], but we have to challenge the agencies to strengthen their Jewish core. Staff and rabbis should celebrate together, and they should respect Shabbat and kashrut, and develop programs for students of Jewish day schools."

The challenge, he said, "is to balance our concern for creative Jewish continuation, and for the participation in the world around us. We need boundaries, and we must build bridges."

Mario Calla, executive director of COSTI Immigrant Services, said his agency's historical roots lie in the Italian community.

"We have maintained services that are specific to those religious and cultural needs, but we have evolved into a multicultural agency," he said.

"When we looked for extra resources, we had to open our doors to other communities. We needed to balance the relationship between our [historical roots and the needs of others.]"

For multiple identities to work, he said, "we have to nurture them respectively. The name COSTI is vague enough to include everyone, but it remains a recognized brand for Italians."

Mark Gryfe, who has held senior professional positions at four organizations, including Baycrest and Mount Sinai Hospital and who now heads Gryfe Philanthropic Solutions, said that each organization must determine when to reach out and build bridges.

"If the organization is considering it, it has to ask 'Why?' Is it to share knowledge, or to access resources. It needs to evaluate where the organization is in its evolution," Gryfe said.

"Building bridges is undoubtedly a good thing, but if the reasons are not clear, it could run risks. [Organizations] should never lose sight of the things that are important. They need to build bridges, and have their boundaries respected."

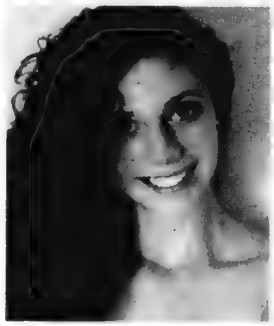
Student to compete in teen pageant

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

A Toronto student, Brittany Danishevsky, will represent the city in the Miss Teen Canada-World pageant finals this summer.

The 17-year-old Newtonbrook Secondary School student was crowned Miss Teen Toronto-World at the Holiday Inn Airport in January.



Brittany Danishevsky

In July, 70 finalists from across Canada will compete for the Miss Teen Canada-World title, with the winner representing the country at the Miss Teen International Pageant in Chicago.

Danishevsky was born and raised in Toronto and is a first-time pageant contender. She competed in the evening gown and swimwear categories and had a personal interview. Each competitor also attends seminars and workshops designed to boost confidence and enhance skills such as public speaking, community outreach and image development.

Contestants are not judged only for their physical beauty, but also for their personality, public speaking, stage presence, fitness, fundraising, platform, community involvement and social media.

Danishevsky is a dedicated volunteer and is passionate about youth mental health.

"By raising awareness, I hope to change negative stigma in order to ease the healing process of those suffering," she said in a phone interview. "I have created my own organization called Chance Through Dance, a not-for-profit where we provide workshops for youth and teach them how to use dance to deal with adversity."

Chance Through Dance is organizing workshops with the City of Toronto, YMCA, Covenant House and North York Women's Shelters.

"I believe youth today struggle because they are not heard," Danishevsky said.

The Grade 12 student is president of the school's athletic council and is on several school teams including volleyball and cross-country.

She is also the choreographer for the dance team. She learned to dance when she was six and used to do competitive Latin dancing until age 14. She then switched to studio dances, such as lyrical and hip hop.

"My organization evolved through my love of dance. It was my way of expressing myself," she explained.

As part of the preparation for the national Miss Teen Canada pageant, contestants have to raise funds for the contest's official charity, Free the Children.

"The contestant who raises the most, together with the crowned Miss Teen Canada-World, will get a trip to volunteer in a Third World country, which is a huge dream of mine. My plan is to hold a fundraiser that showcases Chance Through Dance, with performances by youth, where all ticket proceeds will go toward Free the Children.

"I believe I have a path to travel and I am meant to help others in my life. The most important reason I chose to do this pageant is for volunteerism, so I can perform youth mitzvah and help others," Danishevsky said.

German government honours George Brady

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

He's had numerous newspaper articles written about him and his wartime history, along with a best-selling children's book, radio interviews, video documentaries and speaking engagements the world over. And last week, George Brady's star climbed even higher as the government of Germany honoured him with a civilian decoration.

Brady, now 85, whose story of survival and remembrance was captured in the book Hana's Suitcase, received the Cross of the Order of Merit of the Federal Republic of Germany. The medal was awarded to Brady because of his work toward remembrance, reconciliation and outreach, said the German consul general in Toronto, Sabina Sparwasser.

Brady, 85, was joined by his wife and children for a brief ceremony at the German Consulate. Dignitaries from the German and Czech diplomatic missions, including both countries' ambassadors, were also present.

In presenting the award, Sparwasser said, "Your extraordinary achievement is to have turned the horror, brutality and loss that you suffered as a child at the hands of the Germans and in the name of Germany into a message of remembrance, love and hope."

Noting the reluctance of Holocaust survivors to come to the German Consulate for documentation, Sparwasser said, "I do not understand, George, how you could find it in your heart to reach out to Germany. I asked you once, and your answer was as simple and powerful as you are: 'The hatred has to stop somewhere.'

"You have given us the most generous of gifts – the gift of friendship," she continued.

"Being here today, I hope, feels like a triumph for you – your struggles to survive the Holocaust, your efforts to honour the memories of those who perished, and, perhaps most astonishingly, your determination to put aside hatred and work for greater tolerance and reconciliation among the peoples of the world."

Speaking to The CJN just prior to receiving the award, Brady said, "I think it's an incredible turn of affairs. If you think about it, 70 years ago I was practically being killed."

He said the award shows German officials remembered the past, "are sorry about what happened and are trying to make up for it."

Brady's story first appeared on the front page of The CJN more than 11 years ago. George and his sister, Hana, were children in wartime Czechoslovakia who were imprisoned in Theresienstadt. Hana was deported to Auschwitz, where she was killed. A replica of Hana's suitcase was retrieved by Japanese Holocaust educator Fumiko Ishioka, who contacted George and set off the chain of events that led to the book, documentary and, most recently, the award by the German government.

UJA Federation, Uof T join forces on Holocaust Remembrance Day

Professor Doris Bergen gives compelling lecture on expressions of guilt in survivor accounts

By Daniel Koren

On January 27th, 2005 – the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau – the United Nations decreed that date would would be known as International Holocaust Remembrance Day, to remember the victims of the Shoah.

Since than, every member state of the UN participates in promoting educational awareness on this day, in a bid to prevent further genocides.

This year, in a joint effort between UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, and the Centre for Jewish Studies at University of Toronto, attendees had the opportunity to hear from Dr. Doris Bergen, Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Professor of Holocaust Studies at University of Toronto.

In attendance sat some of Canada's key political figures, including former MP Mario Silva, Mark Adler, MP, and Jason Kenney, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who gave a compelling address on Canada's commitment to Holocaust education, and its new leadership role in the field by chairing the International Alliance of Holocaust Remembrance (IHRA) in 2013. Honey Sherman, Chair, and Mira Goldfarb, Executive Director of the Neuberger Holocaust Centre, commended Canada's involvement and announced that the Centre's Holocaust Education Week 2013 would be presented together with the University of Toronto in conjunction with the IHRA international delegates conference. UJA Federation's Holocaust Education Week has been recognized for its educational achievements by the IHRA for the last two years.

In her address, Dr. Bergen analyzed and identified aspects of guilt, blame and shame found in various survivor testimonials and excerpts from biographies. Beginning with a passage from Italian literary icon Primo Levi, Bergen made her way across various survivor accounts that depict their remorse and regret at some of the decisions they were forced to make during their painful ordeal. She poignantly contrasted these with the absence of remorse and reflection in many perpetrator accounts.

Bergen concluded her lecture with a moving and thought-provoking theory; "Perhaps it's important to remember survivors not as heroes or role models but as human beings: imperfect, unable to see the future, and knowing of the uncertainty of the choices we make. Perhaps it's that recognition of humility that is the most important lesson we can take from thinking of guilt and blame."

UJA Federation's PJ Library continues outreach to York Region's young families

There's nothing like sitting around a roaring campfire, eating 'smores' and singing camp songs.

But in February?!

Summer comes alive February 17th from 4-6 pm at the Garnet Williams Community Centre in Thornhill as Jewish summer camps join PJ Library in the launching of its newest initiative, PJ Kids go to Camp. The fun fair will include an afternoon of free activities and entertainment for young families featuring camp style games, crafts, songs, story-telling and of course, camp snacks. The sing along around a 'faux' campfire will be sure to provide visitors with an authentic camp experience in the middle of a cold Toronto winter.

The event, in partnership with the Ontario Council of Jewish Camps and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, will also give families the opportunity to learn more about the myriad of Jewish not-for-profit camps in Ontario. Participating camps include Camp George, Camp Gesher, J. Academy, Camp Kadima, Camp Northland BB, Camp Ramah in Canada, Camp Shalom, Camp Solelim, Camp Moshava and the Jack & Pat Kay Centre Camp, the lone day camp represented. Camp staff will be leading the fun at all activities.

The impact of Jewish summer camp cannot be ignored. According to a recent survey by the Foundation for Jewish Camps, the influence of summer camp on the ways in which adult Jews choose to engage with the community can be felt long after the last sunset of the summer. Camp attendance increases the likelihood of adult participation and identification in the Jewish community, and in the practice of Jewish behaviours in their lives, from Shabbat candle lighting to using Jewish websites, as well as the appreciation of the value of Jewish charity.

PJ Library, a program of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has been at the forefront of outreach to young Jewish families in York Region since its launch in the region in May 2010. The program is part of an international award-winning program that offers free, high-quality Jewish books and music each month to children between the ages of 6 months to 5 ½ years old and provides monthly family programming. Over 1800 families are currently part of the local PJ community. PJ Kids programs will focus on the 6-9 year olds who have 'graduated' out of PJ Library programming.

PJ Kids Go To Camp is a free event, however registration is required at www.pjlibrary905.ca.

For more information about PJ Kids Go to Camp, Sunday February 17th from 4-6 pm please contact pjlibrary@ujafed.org.

U.S. ambassador shares her success stories

Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

Some people dream of being successful actors. Others dream of becoming doctors or novelists.

Meryl Frank had a very specific dream: she wanted to be the U.S. ambassador to the UN Commission on the Status of Women. She never thought her fantasy would become a reality, but it did.

In graduate school, she studied political science and international relations. She also had four children in the span of seven years and became a stay-at-home mom.

Frank eventually got involved with her local school board, because she was upset with her son's school and realized she'd have to do something about the problem herself.

Through her school-board activities, she met the mayor of her borough, Highland Park, N.J. He was a two-term mayor and she had no political experience, but that didn't stop her from running against him for mayor, which she did with help from her friends.

"We were women that would meet at 10 o'clock at night because we had to put our kids to bed," Frank said during a recent lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation organized by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center.

"They were college professors, they were secretaries – they were women that wanted to help. In fact, the opposition called us 'the mommies.' What they didn't know is that mommies are very smart. Mommies know how to organize. Mommies know other mommies."

To the surprise of many residents, Frank ended up winning the election by a landslide. "This was such a big landslide in an area in New Jersey that is known for corrupt politics, that it was a half page in the New York Times," she told an audience of mostly women at the Toronto synagogue.

Frank served as mayor of Highland Park for almost 10 years, from 2000 to 2010.

After President Barack Obama won his first election in 2008, one of Frank's friends suggested she should go after the position of ambassador to the UN Commission on the Status of Women. "I put an application in online. I am not kidding you, I put it in online," she said.

By then, Frank had already been involved in both local and national politics, and had helped advocate for national and regional legislation, including the Family and Medical Leave Act, signed by president Bill Clinton.

She said Obama's office sent her name to then secretary-of-state Hillary Clinton, who had worked with Frank. Before she knew it, the job she dreamed of having was hers. She was appointed to the position in 2009.

Frank, now a retired ambassador, said it was an honour to speak at the United Nations on behalf of her country. "You say everything that is, in fact, dictated by the White House and the State Department – which is the way it should be," she said. "Because if you say something, and it's not the policy or you're misunderstood, this changes world politics."

She did, however, make an exception when she was invited to speak to the UN General Assembly. It was the 15th anniversary of the World Conference on Women, and Frank was the only female representative speaking on behalf of a region – all the other representatives were men.

Frank said that she said something along the lines of: "I am so honoured to be here to speak on behalf of my country. But I am doubly honoured to be the only woman." Luckily, the room erupted in applause, and she knew she wouldn't be in trouble for saying something that wasn't in her speech.

"The fact that I was scared because I said something that wasn't in the script… told me that maybe this dream was not what I really wanted," she said. "Maybe I was better at something else."

Meryl Frank

The "something else" turned out to be teaching and empowering other women. Frank, who has also served as president of the Women's Division of the American Jewish Congress, now works with organizations that talk to women around the globe about leadership.

Frank talked about some of the unsung heroes she's met through her travels. One is the first Bedouin woman to become a member of parliament in Jordan.

"Being a Jew is why I do what I do," Frank said. "It's very clear to me that I have in my marrow, because I'm a Jew, an understanding of a need for social justice."

After her lecture, she told The CJN, "I am viewing the world on the cusp of change… I feel honoured to be a part of it and to help ease the transition. To help women ease into that transition."

Rabbis upgrade marriage counselling skills

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Three Canadian rabbis are among 40 participants in Yeshiva University's new rabbinic marriage counselling course.

The year-long online lecture series began in October. It focuses on the rabbi's role, including collaboration with couples, families, and mental health professionals in formulating and implementing a counseling plan, according to a news release from YU, the New York institution often referred to as the flagship of modern Orthodoxy.

Rabbi Aaron Greenberg

The course, which includes two daylong seminars at YU, covers relationship stages from dating through death and divorce.

Instructors include mental health professionals – clinical psychologists, social workers, and a sexual counsellor – and authorities in Jewish marital law. Ottawa's Rabbi Reuven Bulka – spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas and a PhD in psychology – is on the faculty.

The curriculum includes "important but often ignored topics" such as abuse, blended families, adoption, illness, death and homosexuality, Rabbi Jacob Schacter, senior scholar of YU's Center for the Jewish Future (CJF), said in a news release. The CJF is running the program with the university's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Rabbinical Theological Seminary.

"Our hope is that this course will cultivate a rabbinic culture that is grounded in confidence, receptiveness to new ideas, and a true understanding of the need to become close partners with mental health professionals," Rabbi Schacter said in the release.

Rabbi Levi Mostofsky, the CJF's director of continuing education and the co-director of the course, told The CJN that while YU's rabbinical school has formal coursework in pastoral psychology, the new continuing education course is different, because "the rabbis are out in the field and have engaged with some of these issues... They have a more sophisticated view... It's a whole different conversation."

Participating rabbis are based in North America, Australia and Israel.

Rabbi Mostofsky added that the course explores the rabbis' continuing role as well as their "unique rabbinic role," which can include community education on issues like abuse.

Rabbi Mark Fishman, assistant rabbi of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Montreal, told The CJN he is taking the course to improve his listening and counselling skills as he prepares to take over as senior rabbi in July, when Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz retires.

Rabbi Fishman, a 34-year-old native of London, England, hopes to create a "marriage institute" at Beth Tikvah. He currently runs an informal program at the shul for young married men, called "Men in the Kitchen," which consists of cooking classes supplemented by "positive communication techniques."

Rabbi Aaron Greenberg, who runs a young adult service at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation as part of the Heshe and Harriet Seif Jewish Learning Initiative on Campus, said he deals with many young couples who are dating or about to get married.

The YU course appealed to him because it's something he "always wanted to do," he said. "You want to fine-tune your skills."

Most Orthodox rabbis will not officiate at a wedding unless the couple has had some type of counselling ahead of time, Rabbi Greenberg noted. He usually meets with 25 grooms a year, and his wife works with the brides.

Rabbi Greenberg lauded the course's faculty as "the best of the best... What's great about the course is that you really have an opportunity to focus on issues that are affecting the entire Jewish community."

As well, he added, networking with professionals in the field is "really important."

Rabbi Rafi Lipner, the only YU alumnus of the three Canadian rabbis, said he finds the course "extremely valuable."

The founder of The House, a drop-in learning centre for young adults, Rabbi Lipner became spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation last summer.

He has officiated at about two dozen weddings through The House, where couples who are dating or engaged can take part in a "relationship" series.

As a rabbi, he said, "you want to develop a relationship when things are going well and hope that you're a resource when things are tough."

EU's Hezbollah policy has a steep price

Bulgaria's release of a report blaming Hezbollah for the bombing of a tourist bus in the city of Burgas last July that killed five Israelis and the Bulgarian bus driver has focused attention on the European Union, which, to date, has refused to label Hezbollah a terrorist organization.

Bulgaria, an EU member, went to extraordinary lengths, with American and Israeli forensic assistance, to determine that Iranian-backed Hezbollah was almost certainly responsible for the attack prior to announcing its verdict, out of concern about the pressure this would put on other EU members.

On Feb. 5, the New York Times noted: "[Bulgaria's] announcement could force the European Union to reconsider designating the Lebanon-based group as a terrorist organization and cracking down on its fund-raising. That would upend Europe's policy of quiet tolerance of the group."

This led Walter Russell Mead, the respected strategic analyst, to remark on his American Interest blog that, if the Times is right, "Europe may now be in the process of discovering a spine."

Mead's hope may be a long time coming. For it seems that, even though Hezbollah carried out a deadly attack on EU soil, this may not be sufficient reason to cause other EU members, primarily France and Germany, to call a spade a spade. (Designating Hezbollah a terrorist organization requires unanimity among all 27 EU member states, but support from influential France and Germany is key.)

The Associated Press reported on Feb. 6 that, according to a spokesperson for German Chancellor Angela Merkel, "consequences will have to follow" if the evidence against Hezbollah is confirmed (although such consequences were not specified). AP noted that since Hezbollah has "almost 1,000 members" in the country collecting funds for the group, a legal ban would have major consequences that Germany might not be prepared to tackle.

In the Feb. 6 Jerusalem Post, Herb Keinon argued that despite Hezbollah's well documented involvement in global terrorism since the twin bombings in Argentina in the 1990s, the Europeans have decided to look the other way. (Two exceptions, as Keinon notes, are the Netherlands and Britain, the latter of which only labels Hezbollah's "armed wing" a terrorist organization).

Keinon remarked cynically: "The EU chose, and still continues to choose, to avert its eyes, not because of a lack of facts, but because of the interests and political considerations of some EU member states. And these interests and considerations will not change because of the Bulgarian report."

In a study for the American Jewish Committee on Hezbollah's activities in Europe, Yehudit Barsky drew attention to the westerners in Lebanon, including German and French citizens, who were kidnapped and held hostage by Hezbollah from 1985 to 1990. Following that, it appears a modus vivendi was reached whereby Hezbollah was allowed to operate relatively freely in Europe.

In the Feb. 6 Times of Israel, Raphael Ahren wrote: "Among policy analysts, it is indeed clear that the French are behind the EU's refusal and had actually been pressuring Bulgarian authorities not to name Hezbollah so as not to up the pressure on them" and possibly incur a violent response.

Hassan Nasrallah, the head of Hezbollah

Ahren interviewed counter-terrorism expert Matthew Levitt, who said: "The Europeans feel that if you poke Hezbollah or Iran in the eye, then they will do the same to you. If you leave them alone, then maybe they will leave you alone."

France, Levitt explained, is particularly worried about the fate of its almost 900 troops who are part of UNIFIL, the United Nations Forces in Lebanon. After all, in 1983, 58 French paratroopers were killed in a Hezbollah truck bombing in Beirut, and between 1985 and 1986, 13 people were killed and 250 injured in a wave of 15 bombing attacks in Paris carried out by its operatives. France doesn't want to risk returning to those days, nor does it want to risk losing its "influence" with the Lebanese government, now dominated by Hezbollah.

The price of keeping this feckless status quo, however, may be too steep – as demonstrated in Burgas last summer.

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Teach kids Israel's history, prof urges

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

If parents explain Zionism to their children alluding only to the Holocaust, and not talking about early Zionists' "voluntary choice to take destiny into [their] own hands," those parents are not doing "any service at all" for the next generation, according to historian Ken Stein.

Ken Stein

The Atlanta-based professor was in Toronto recently to speak at a program called Israel and the Diaspora: challenges we face together. The Jan. 31 event at the Park Hyatt Toronto was sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israel engagement initiative and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

Stein teaches at Emory University, where he established the Institute for the Study of Israel. A professor of Middle Eastern history, political science and Israeli studies, he was an adviser to former U.S. president Jimmy Carter and is president of the independent Center for Israel Education, which he founded in 2007.

In her introduction, Micki Mizrahi, an Israel engagement committee member, said it's "hard to respond when Israel is being verbally attacked. That's why Ken Stein is here tonight."

Jewish youth here are distancing themselves from Israel, Stein said. "We have to do a better job amongst our peers and amongst our youth, and if we did that, I think we'd have less complaints on the university campuses."

He likened Zionism to American baseball: "It has to do with not having a home field, but playing always away games until you actually built a field of dreams of your own."

Among Israel's accomplishments, which Stein termed "extraordinary," he noted gay and lesbian rights, and women's "absolute equality and freedom to choose."

As well, he asked, as part of a series of rhetorical questions, "Which country in the Middle East puts its values over its interests?

"What country in the Middle East is a strategic asset of the United States and North America and all the democracies, particularly at this moment when the Middle East is going through a spin cycle, and that spin cycle could last decades?

"Those are pretty good accomplishments for a country that's only 65."

He also noted that Jews have gone from being powerless to acquiring power, and that the Jewish experience as a minority "has shaped how we behave."

"Jews now want to protect their prerogative to make their own choices. Our great-grandparents couldn't do that, and that's why we so hold fast to the need to do so."

He spoke of Israel's right to self-determination, including the pursuit of Hezbollah, and an Israeli Supreme Court ruling in favour of a Palestinian farmer whose land had been confiscated by the IDF.

"We have to teach our kids that the preservation of choice is terribly important for us as Jews wherever we live, and that it binds us as much as parshat hashavuah," Stein said, referring to the weekly Torah portion.

Israel is in a tough neighbourhood, he noted. "The neighbourhood's not going to change."

In a question-answer session following his speech, Stein said that parents start to educate their children about Israel too late and have abrogated responsibility for Jewish identity to institutions.

If young people don't know Israel's history – including the struggle and the threat from neighbouring countries – and feel good about it, then "we have been lazy," he said.

Having Israelis in the classroom is terrific, he said, but it's not a substitute for parents reinforcing the messages at home.

Tuition subsidy for new students

The program is for new students entering nursery, junior kindergarten, senior kindergarten, or grades 1 or 2.

For the past five years, Petersiel said, the school has been following up to see why some parents inquire about the school, but don't choose it. "Finances being the number 1 reason has risen threefold in the last five years alone," he said.

Tuition for all-day preschool for the 2013-2014 year is $13,900.

"The more students in the school, the lesser the burden on everyone," Petersiel said.

While the school population has dropped this year by about 10 per cent in Thornhill, there are 100 new students at the south campus, and a combined total of 915 students at both campuses.

"Because we've grown," Petersiel said, "we have been able to keep [next year's tuition] increase under three per cent."

PHYSICS CHALLENGE

Senior high school students from around the world are invited to form teams and take on the challenge of the Weizmann Institute of Science's Shaiheveth Freier Physics Tournament. The object is to build a safe using simple materials and a locking mechanism that operates on the principles of physics. Winners of the local competition, along with their coach, travel to Israel to compete internationally. Seen from left are this year's team from The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel campus: Erin Mandel, Bailey Bernknopf, Ron Haber, Mark Sirkin and David Chesney.

לילה במאי- תיאטרון המפגש

תיאטרון המפגש הינו התיאטרון היחיד בשפה העברית בטורונטו, חו לו העונה החמישית שהוא מביא לקהל הישראלי והיהודי הצעות ישראליות מקוריות שזוכות להצלחה גדולה ולתגובה נלהבת של הציבור שלנו. התיאטרון נתמך על ידי מרכז שוורץ-ריסמן של הפדראציה והשנה נוסף לו גם תיאטרון ילדים בעברית שיעלה באביב את ההצגה "אנה פרנק".

שלוש הצגות תתקיימנה ב CITY PLAYHOUSE ביום שבת בערב, וביום א' ה 24 בפברואר ב1:30 וב- 7:30 בערב. כרטיסים אצל תמי 905.764.7817

כדאי לראות

הסרט IMPOSSIBLE מביא את סיפורה האמיתי של משפחה בריטית, הורים ושלושה בנים, שמבלים את חופשת כריסמאס שלהם באתר חוף מקסים בתאילנד, כשצונאמי נוחת על החוף ללא התראה מוקדמת. די היססתי אם ללכת לסרט, כי כללית אני לא אוהב סרטי אסונות ואימה. אבל טעיתי- מעבר למראה האירוע עצמו, שאותו ואי כבר ראיתם ב"בקרוב", זהו סרט נוגע ללב ומאוד אמיתי על יחסי אנוש, ועל איך שאנשים מוצאים כוחות עליונים שהם לא ידעו שיש בהם. גם המבוגרים, אך בעיקר שלושת הילדים, משחקים בצורה נוגעת ללב, אך לא קיצ'ית, וגורמים לקהל להרטיב מטפחות וניירות טישו.

גזעני בית"ר ירושלים

אם יש לכם הסבר מניח את הדעת- אשמח לפרסמו.

Have an allergy-free Purim!

Jewish holidays and food. No surprises there. But if the treats that are exchanged and left at the doorstep on Purim – including home-baked goods with unexpected ingredients –the glorious holiday could bring some unwelcome surprises for people with food allergies and sensitivities. Today, advice for a merry and safe Purim.

"The other day someone asked what my plans are for Purim. I think, like every other parent of food-allergic children, my heart skipped a beat and sunk to my feet. Not this time of year again!" writes Sara Atkins. "Purim should be filled with fun, excitement and laughs, but for a family dealing with food allergies, it's pure fear." Atkins then explains how with preparation and some clever food substitutions she was able to transform Purim into a holiday her children would actually look forward to. [http://bit.ly/purimfood1]

DebbieN faced a different challenge: how to bake up a batch of low-carb hamantashen without artificial sweeteners that will be safe – and appealing – to a child with diabetes. The problem with hamantashen is that they deliver the carbs, but "they don't have enough fiber or protein to slow down the sugars and avoid a spike in blood glucose. In short, not high-quality nutrition." She finally found one that makes sense: substituting almond meal for some or most of the flour. Check out her blog for dough and Debbie's tricks to stretch those carbs. [http://bit.ly/purimfood2]

As for the filling, Nancy Pascal says, "Low-carb jam works well and tastes delicious. Sugar-free chocolate chips are very good when hot, but not as delightful when cold, so you can try placing the hamantashen in the microwave for a few seconds before eating." [http://bit.ly/purimfood3]

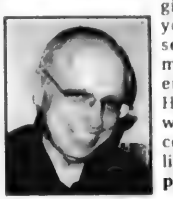
Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Many recipes call for flour, which of course is a show-stopper for anyone with celiac disease, an intolerance to gluten. That's where Nancy Lapid comes in with not one but six gluten-free hamantashen recipes, including a dairy variation that calls for butter, cream cheese, sugar, vanilla extract and an (optional) egg. [http://bit.ly/purimfood5]

No eggs? No problem. According to the (perfectly named) site, Allergy Shmallergy, here's your substitution for two eggs: "1/4 cup applesauce and 1-1/2 tsp. Ener-G egg replacer combined with 2 tbsp. water or soy milk." [http://bit.ly/purimfood6] Leslie Shupak's No Egg Hamantashen takes more of minimalist approach and sticks to the basics: flour, baking powder, salt, margarine, sugar, water and vanilla extract. [http://bit.ly/purimfood7]

Aside from hamantashen, you should also take into consideration food allergies and sensitivities as you pack up the mishloach manot gift baskets or plan your menu for the seudah, the festive meal eaten at the end of the holiday. Here's a discussion with menu ideas if certain foods are off limits. [http://bit.ly/purimfood9]



Atkins shares her feelings about the holiday – after taking the necessary precautions. "That fear will never go away as long as the kids are still allergic. But the fear that they will be turned off from Judaism because the celebrations have only brought them heartache is gone, and because of that, my heart skips a few less beats and doesn't sink as far into my feet when I hear it's Purim time once again."

Thanking God with blessings

Around eight years ago, I decided to try my hand at cooking by preparing a dafina (Moroccan cholent) for my congregation.

I surfed the net, found a recipe and followed it carefully. To my surprise, the dafina was delicious. My wife asked who made the dafina, and when she found out it was me, she told me I was hired! It was the beginning of a new hobby.

For me, cooking is a time of meditation, especially when I'm alone and it's quiet. It's a time of introspection where I realize the abundance that HaShem provides us with every moment. How do we thank God for this abundance?

There are many ways to express our appreciation for His bounty, and reciting brachot is certainly one of them.

A brachah is a formula specified by Jewish law by which we thank God. It can be long or short, but it invariably contains the name of God and a phrase beginning with the words "Baruch Atah" ("Blessed are You").

Many biblical commentators question this terminology, for how is it possible, they ask, for a person to bless God, who lacks nothing? What do we mean when we declare that God is "baruch"?

The Chizkuni (13th-century France), says in Bereshit (24:27) that the word "baruch," when used in relation to God, is an expression of greeting or praise.

The Rashba (1235–1310, Spain) posits in a responsa that a brachah is the acknowledgement that He is Ruler over all, and everything comes from Him. As the Talmud states, "A person must bless [God] for the bad just as he must bless Him for the good (Brachot 60b)." The Rashba continues by explaining that the word "brachah" comes from the word "breichah," meaning reservoir of water (i.e., the source of everything).

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Rabbi Chaim Volozhin (1749-1821, Lithuania), says in Nefesh HaChaim, that the expression "baruch" means multiplicity and abundance.

Rambam (1135-1204, Spain) explains in a wonderfully clear manner in Yad Hachazakah, when treating the subject of brachot, that the wording of the brachah was instituted by Ezra and his court (circa 350 BCE) and that anyone who deviates from the wording of a brachah is mistaken. The exception to the aforementioned blessings' origin are the biblically commanded Birkat Hamazon and Birkat HaTorah.

The Rambam teaches that the purpose of brachot is to acknowledge the awesome reality that God is the Creator of everything. Human nature causes us to believe, mistakenly, that the beautiful lunch we enjoyed today, the great car we saved for years to buy or the library we've built over the years all belong to us.

But the fact of the matter is that all of these things really belong to God and are on loan to us. Reciting a brachah acknowledges this truth.

We are so fortunate. Let us seize the many opportunities we have each day to thank God for what we have.

Disconnecting to connect

Class Act

Daniel Held

After waiting four months for the kinks to be ironed out, I download iOS 6, Apple's new mobile operating system. The update includes a slew of features –Facebook integration, photo sharing, etc. Most exciting is "Do Not Disturb," a setting to pause the torrent of bings, bleeps, dings and vibrations that come with the digital age.

My life is abuzz with the sounds of my iPhone, iPad and computer: a ping for email, a buzz for Facebook messages, a tone for Skype calls, and the occasional ring of a phone. Sometimes it seems that hardly a minute goes by without some jingle.

I've started searching for moments of silence. Two weeks ago, I declared 5 to 7:30 p.m. – from when my daughter comes home to her bedtime – to be email-free hours. We still Skype with grandparents and answer texts, but I try to avoid emails.

This week, I'm experimenting with a plan to check email only once an hour. Fighting the Pavlovian urge to flip to Gmail every time I hear an email ping, I'm waiting until the last 10 minutes of each hour to sort through new messages. This system is an attempt to raise productivity and retain focus for longer stretches. We'll see how it goes.

Taking time out stems from the fourth commandment: "Six days you shall labour and do all your work, but the seventh day is a Sabbath of the Lord your God; on it you shall not do any work." (Exodus 20)

Inspired by Shabbat, Reboot – an organization devoted to inspiring under-connected Jews to generate projects that impact the Jewish and non-Jewish worlds – has pioneered the National Day of Unplugging. The annual event (this year it's on March 1-2) encourages people to take a brief respite from their digital devices – to disconnect in order to connect.

But Shabbat is more than the "Do Not Disturb" function. Reboot's Shabbat Manifesto offers 10 principles designed "to slow down lives in an increasingly hectic world": 1. Avoid technology; 2. Connect with loved ones; 3. Nurture your health; 4. Get outside; 5. Avoid commerce; 6. Light candles; 7. Drink wine; 8. Eat bread; 9. Find silence; 10. Give back.

The manifesto takes the Jewish particularism of Shabbat and makes it universal. Reboot calls it "a modern spin on the ancient day of rest for people of all denominations." Kiddush becomes "drinking wine." "You shall not work" becomes "avoid commerce." Hamotzi becomes "eat bread." Prayer becomes "find silence."

There's certainly something appealing about paring Shabbat down to its universalistic appeal. Universalism is what enables a White House Passover seder, Chanukah to become the holiday of lights, and a mitzvah to be common parlance for a good deed. At the same time, pursuing the universal to the exclusion of the particular is what makes kashrut, Shavuot and Israel irrelevant to so many.

If Shabbat is only about unplugging, then I celebrate it every day from 5 to 7:30. But there's more. I wonder what could be added to the Shabbat Manifesto to remind us that, at its core, Shabbat has both universal appeal and a particularistic source – "the seventh day is a Sabbath of the lord your God."

Penny ante

Rabbi Erwin Schild

Guest Voice

Gevalt! My fundamental human right to practise my religion without government interference has been violated! I raise my voice, or more realistically, I press my computer keys in protest and indignation.

My outrage is directed at the abolition of the one-cent coin. The penny, like the ancient "pruta," is to be no more.

Jews associate their daily prayer services with the giving of tzedakah. In my synagogue, the Adath Israel Congregation, as in almost every shul, a pushke, a charity box, is circulated during the service so that the worshippers, while praying for their own needs, may perform a meritorious deed by giving a little to charity. It is a token gift, requiring no cheque or credit card, though I must mention that one of our daily worshippers drops a five-dollar bill into the box each morning.

My contribution is much more modest. Like the majority of our worshippers, I extricate some coins from my pocket. However, the amount of my small gift is calculated on the basis of "gematria," the numerical values of a Hebrew word that guide my gift in a mystical way.

I take out my coins and combine several coins to amount to 36 cents, which is twice "chai," "life," a silent prayer for life and health for my wife and me. Or I may find a quarter and three pennies, for 28 or "koach," strength, a blessing that I certainly need. Sometimes I make it 32 cents, the number value of "lev," the heart, symbolizing my prayer for the health of my heart that I cannot take for granted.

Rabbi Erwin Schild

So you see that I need pennies. I cannot do without one-cent coins. I can compose 30 with a quarter and a nickel, and 30 is "lamed," which is a word related to learning and teaching, but I need a little more choice.

I therefore appeal to the government to rescind this haughty abolition of the humble penny. If that is not possible, then I demand the introduction of a new 18-cent coin, to be called the "chai," possibly with the images of Queen Esther and Mordechai (not the editor of The CJN.) I will then use two of these every morning for double chai, or as an alternative, combine one new coin with a dime for 28 which means "koach", strength. Or I would combine our new coin with three dimes, so that it would amount to "moach," brains, and that's something we all need.

Happy Purim!

Rabbi Erwin Schild is rabbi emeritus at Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto.

Program supports Jewish social innovators

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Leaders of non-profits who participate in a new initiative called Genesis will get skills training to help their organizations achieve success, as well as free office space for their groups.

Launched by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto on Jan. 31, Genesis will help five "incubator" organizations at a time, selecting new residents each year.

The first group consists of the Annex Shul, the JED Institute, the Jewish Business Network, Project A.I.M. and Shoresh Jewish Environmental Progams.

Genesis supports "Jewish social innovation" through offering mentorship and skills training, focusing on a different skill each month through workshops and instruction from a mentor

The initiative is "about building a Jewish community that's relevant to the next generation," said Genesis director Alexandra Kuperman.

Spiritual leader of the Annex Shul, Yacov Fruchter, a non-denominational, independent minyan that serves young professionals and families, said, "We're trying to figure out how to build and how to become sustainable." He added that having access to free office space is especially helpful.

Rabbi Rafi Lipner of The House runs Genesis' speaker series, which brings successful people in the non-profit world to an event where they speak about their work, sharing with the public the wisdom they've gained through experience.

Speaking at Genesis' launch, Rabbi Lipner discussed Jewish social innovation.

"Innovation is doing things differently... Social innovation realizes we are here to serve others," he said, adding there's no set definition for "Jewish social innovation," specifically whether it means the innovation is for Jews or innovation that stems from Jewish values

Paul Alofs

The launch featured the first speaker in the series: Paul Alofs, president and CEO of the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation, which recently received a $50-million donation from Emmanuelle Gattuso and her broadcast mogul husband, Allan Slaight.

Alofs shared his wisdom on "passion capital," which he called the most important aspect of success. He described the seven building blocks to finding passion capital: defining your organization's creed, culture (meaning nourishing your passion), courage, building your brand's reputation, finding resources, planning a strategy and persistence.

"Passion capital is the world's most valuable asset," he said, adding that if you have passion capital, it will eventually lead you to success in raising money.

On Feb. 28, four-time Olympic gold-medal speed-skater Johann Olav Koss will share wisdom from his experience as CEO of Right to Play, a non-profit that brings sports to disadvantaged communities around the world. April 4 will feature Marc Kielburger, co-founder of Free the Children, and on May 30, Elisha Muskat, CEO of Ashoka Canada, will speak.

Having these great speakers and professionals to guide the Annex Shul is a huge help, Fruchter said, adding that he especially hopes to learn fundraising strategies and board governance.

"[These organizations] started to do the work... because in their heart they believe it's what they have to do," Kuperman said. "Genesis is working to support these change-makers."

The participating organizations get temporary office space in the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Student Life, sharing the building with Hillel of Greater Toronto.

This arrangement is perfect because many of the non-profit organizations are targeting young adults, and so perhaps young people who are graduating might feel inspired to continue their involvement in the Jewish community through joining one of the resident organizations, Kuperman said.

"If you leave Hillel and you don't know where to go next, I think that's a real loss," she said. "It's a connection point, which I think is really important."

Although the program picks only five resident organizations annually, other non-profit groups can find help through Genesis, but without the free office space. Anybody can attend the Genesis speaker series, and Kuperman said she has a mailing list of organizations that seek assistance. Interested organizations should approach Genesis to be placed on the mailing list since they will be called for submissions in the autumn when Genesis accepts applications for the next round of residencies, she said.

Groups must fit certain criteria, such as being established in and having a track record in Toronto, and they must include several people.

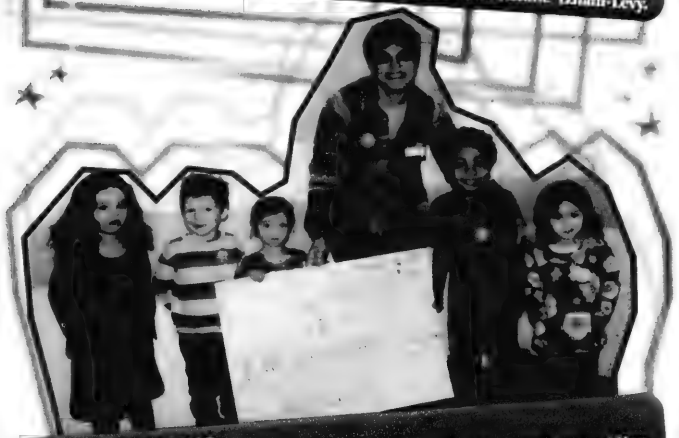
'TOURING' ISRAEL

The shinshinim (Israeli emissaries) at Robbins Hebrew Academy's Beth Tikvah campus introduced students in kindergarten to Grade 2 to an Israeli TV program that shows two people visiting various places throughout Israel. Together with the shinshinim, students created their own passports to use while travelling in Israel. Pictured, clockwise from front left, are Aitan Hamou, Libby Glazman-Bakous, Makenna Gillick, Nico Finkielsztein, emissary Shoval Rozenberg, Liat Assraf, Liam Klein and Ronnie Tznani-Levy.



FUN FUNDRAISING

The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre Nursery School held its second annual Hop, Skip and Jump challenge last week. Children aged 18 months to five years hopped, skipped, jumped and ran around the track for 30 minutes and raised more than $2,200. Proceeds will help children from low-income families attend educational programs at the centre. Pictured from left are Mya Eisenstat, Levy Baker, Shana Colman-Peck, director of early childhood education Cathy Indig, Levi Rosenberg-Van Gameren and Julia Kalman.

Stephen Kanee ז"ל died January 18, 2013, at the University of Minnesota Medical Center in Minneapolis. Born in Winnipeg on March 17, 1941, the only child of Sol and Florence Kanee, Stephen grew up in a household devoted to the arts, surrounded with love and nurtured by his aunts and uncles and grandparents, especially by his dear Bubba Rose Kanee.

His father introduced him to fishing at an early age and Stephen enjoyed happy childhood summers out in the boat at their cottage in Lake of the Woods. Stephen's mother ignited in her son his lifelong passion for theater, art and music. Stephen said it was Florence, along with his Bubba Rose, who gave him the inner strength to follow his heart into the dramatic arts.

His apprenticeship in the family flour milling business took him to London, where his interest in theater led to an internship at the avant-garde Royal Court Theatre. In 1974, now a student at the University of Minnesota Theater Department, he was awarded a McKnight Fellowship in Directing, which brought him to the Guthrie Theater.

At the University, he met and fell in love with MaryAnn Lippay. They married in 1981, and their life together became a celebration of love, wit, music, food, art, travel, family and friends. They were a truly devoted and joyous couple, and counted themselves lucky to find each other and the love they shared.

Stephen, who was mentored at the Guthrie by Michael Langham, scored his first success with his production of Harold Pinter's The Caretaker. It was followed by the first Guthrie production of A Christmas Carol, which brought together for the first time playwright Barbara Field, scenic designer Jack Barkla, lighting designer Duane Schuler, costume designer Jack Edwards, and composer Hiram Titus. A Christmas Carol, became a perennial Minneapolis favorite over a 35 year run.

For the Guthrie, while he served as Associate Artistic Director, he also directed Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead, Catsplay, Hamlet, Great Expectations, The Tavern, On the Razzle, The Birthday Party, and I.B. Singer's Teibele and Her Demon, which was later moved to Broadway.

Elsewhere, he directed for the Cricket Theatre, the Houston Grand Opera, the Pittsburgh Public Theatre, Meadowbrook Theater, and Park Square Theatre, among others.

Stephen was a gifted and adventurous director, highly theatrical in style, aware of the music and nuances of his texts. His use of the challenging Guthrie thrust stage was masterful. Under his direction, there never was a bad seat in the house.

When in 1980 the opportunity arose to pursue his life long ambition, teaching, he accepted a faculty position at New Mexico State University, which he held for five years. He then returned to the Guthrie to help steer the theater through a period of transition.

In 1986, he realized his dream to join the faculty of the University of Minnesota Department of Theater Arts and Dance. As an Associate Professor and Head of the Directing Program, he directed Old Times, Spring Awakening, Mrozek's Tango, Two Gentlemen of Verona, The White Devil, The Dybbuk, The Visit, and many others, at Rarig Center and on the Showboat. His theater wisdom and advice helped guide and inspire theater professionals all over the country.

He retired from the faculty in 2003. Stephen said the happiest, most stimulating times of his career were with his students.

Stephen and MaryAnn shared their time between their Minneapolis and Santa Fe homes. In Santa Fe they loved the Opera, the creative arts and natural beauty of New Mexico. They supported and volunteered at the Santa Fe Care Center. In Winnipeg, Stephen carried on his family's support of community and in particular was his interest in the Arthur V. Mauro Centre for Peace and Justice, established at the University of Manitoba by Sol Kanee's close friend and colleague.

In addition to his beloved, MaryAnn Lippay Kanee, he is survived by his cousins Andrea and Stan Levich and family of Minneapolis, Susan and Merle Reekers of Creve Couer MO and family, Richard and Donna Borden of Spokane WA and family, Brian Kanee of Winnipeg and family, and in Toronto, Bonnie and Peter Druxerman and family, Danny and Anye Schachter and family, Robert and Judith Kanee and family, Allan Kanee and Thea Weisdorf and family, and Jeanette Delevie. He is also survived by brother-in-law and fishing partner Drew Lippay and wife, Renee of Portland OR, nieces and nephews, Chris and Julie Lippay and family of Pullman WA, Matthew and Amy Lippay and family of Portland, Aletha Lippay and Adam Goyt and godson Xavier of Fargo ND, by surrogate sibling Barbara Field, and his extended family of loving friends. Special thanks for the love, support and comforting presence of Robert Kanee.

The family is grateful for the care and dedication of the nursing staff of the UMMC Cardiovascular ICU. Contributions in memory of Stephen may be made to the Kanee Mauro Scholars Endowment Fund at the University of Manitoba, (204) 474-9195 or The Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, (204) 477-7520. A Memorial Celebration is planned in Minneapolis for the spring.

Mulcair blasts Ottawa's foreign policy

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — New Democratic leader Thomas Mulcair blasted the Conservative government for abandoning the mediating role that defined Canada's foreign policy throughout the 20th century.

Mulcair told a Montreal audience of 250, mainly from the business and academic worlds, that Prime Minister Stephen Harper has "renounced" the major role Canada once played in upholding peace in the Middle East, as well as in the development of Africa and climate change.

Thomas Mulcair

He charged that the government has done so for the Conservatives' political gain.

Mulcair, who spoke in French, was the guest speaker at a Feb. 7 luncheon of the Montreal Council on Foreign Relations, a non-profit, non-partisan organization founded in 1985.

The abandonment of the role of mediator is "the source of a whole series of setbacks suffered by Canada abroad," said Mulcair, who particularly deplored this government's failure in its bid for a seat on the United Nations Security Council in 2010.

"The Harper government has broken with a foreign policy that was producing results, a policy that was the object of a wide consensus for decades," he said

"They have turned their back on the open and progressive multilateralism for which Canada was renowned and that permitted it to play a preponderant role on the international stage," Mulcair added. "In its place, they have exploited our foreign policy, simply to respond to partisan considerations.

"The interests of a small ideological group has taken precedence over the public interest, and low petty politics has taken precedence over the exercise of true leadership and the realization of a long-term vision."

Mulcair accused the government of an "ideological blindness" that is "costing us collectively very dearly."

He called the Security Council seat loss a "historic humiliation."

"Let's be clear: the reasons offered by the Conservatives to justify this failure have nothing to do with reality. It is false to say that Canada was defeated because we stand too firmly for democracy or human rights," said Mulcair, noting that Germany and Portugal were successful in their bids for seats at that time and that some of Canada's strongest allies voted against its bid.

Mulcair also deplored Foreign Minister John Baird's subsequent "unprecedented attack against" the UN. "He even described Canada's traditional approach as a 'digression' in our country's history.

"This is a rupture when the minister charged with defining our foreign relations sees the role of mediator assumed by Canada over the course of the last 60 years as a 'digression,' indeed even as a mistaken course."

The Harper government's policy, Mulcair said, reflects the mentality of the 1940s, when the world was divided between "black hats and white hats."

Canada, he claimed, has lost influence in the world that was considerable for a middle power, because the reputation it had for independence and acting on principle has been rejected by the Conservatives.

Mulcair said Canada could have done much more to support the reform movements that emerged during the Arab Spring, but did not because it no longer has an institution to promote democracy abroad.

He regretted the government's "sly" dismantling of the Montreal-based International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development, better known as Rights and Democracy.

He said the government has not kept its promise made during the 2011 election campaign, and repeated in the speech from the Throne, to create a new agency.

"Today, we can say that [Rights and Democracy's] dismantling was a historic blunder," Mulcair said. "Once again, the Conservatives do not understand the difference between partisan interests and principles."

Concert features music created in internment

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — At Vancouver's Chutzpah! Festival later this month, Suzanne Snizek and a team of musicians she has assembled will perform music composed and performed in internment by musicians Hans Gál and Franz Reizenstein.

This is music that has never previously been performed in Canada and it represents not just the musical ability of its composers, but the way their internment during the Holocaust moved them and informed their work.

Snizek, a faculty member at the University of Victoria's School of Music, became interested in suppressed music in 2006, when she was a doctoral student at the University of British Columbia.

"I'd always been interested in the issue of detaining people without charge and internment in general. When I googled 'internment and music' up popped Hans Gál and his experience in British internment camps," she recalled. "It was completely shocking to me because, though I was aware of the Holocaust and its historical context, I didn't know about the British internment camps."

The 46-year-old teacher read about Gál and his personal history, listened to his music and loved it. "Suppressed music," by composers who were persecuted or driven into exile, became the subject of her doctoral thesis and is a course she teaches today.

Susanne Snizek

Hans Gál was an Austrian refugee of Jewish origin who had fled to the United Kingdom, only to find himself among thousands classified as "enemy aliens" in 1939. In the spring of 1940 there was mass internment of these individuals, 50-year-old Gál included. At the time he was an established composer who had experienced major success in Germany in the 1920s. He was director of the Mainz Conservatory of Music in Germany until Nazi anti-Jewish legislation forced him to step down.

During his internment, Gál wrote a technically challenging trio for flute and two violins.

"The strange instrumentation reflects the limited instruments and competent players he had in the camp," Snizek said of Gál's Huyton Suite, named after the internment camp where it was written. "Even in a non-internment concert situation, the piece is musically difficult."

The trio was performed several times in Central Promenade Camp, an internment camp on the Isle of Man.

Gál also wrote and co-performed a musical revue titled "What a Life!" to reflect the overall internment experience. "It's a fascinating first-hand portrayal of internment from the internees' viewpoint," she said.

Snizek and seven other musicians will perform "What a Life," the Huyton Suite and a partita (an instrumental suite) for flute and piano by Franz Reizenstein. Before his internment in U.K. camps, Reizenstein had studied in London with a leading English composer, Ralph Vaughn Williams. Williams later helped secure the release from internment of many of the musician internees, including Reizenstein, his former pupil.

As part of her doctoral research, Snizek travelled to London and met with Reizenstein's son, who had just come into possession of 15 large boxes of music manuscripts and concert programs.

"It was his father's entire paper legacy," she said, adding that the first box they opened contained concert programs from the internment camp. "It was quite amazing."

Listeners will find "What a Life!" to be particularly interesting, Snizek said, because it demonstrates the actual conditions of internment. "Each movement represents an aspect of their day-to-day life in internment. One is the ballad of the German refugee, another is the barbed wire song, the women's song, the cleaning up song and the keep fit song," she said. "The ballad is very contemplative, but the whole revue, though it has its serious moments, was intended to entertain, so the tone is pretty light."

The three pieces by Gál represent the work of this should-have-been-famous composer, Snizek said. "It was only because of the Nazis dismissing him that we don't know of him today."

The performance will take place at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver on Feb. 24 at 7 p.m.

After she catches the ferry back to Victoria, though, Snizek plans to continue learning about suppressed music.

"I'm hoping I can get funding and time to go back to the Isle of Man and continue to do research, hopefully for a book on the subject," she said.

Educator urges Jewish education 'tax'

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish community should consider levying a "tax" on all Jewish families to offset the rising cost of Jewish day school education, says one of the most experienced administrators in the field.

Evie Blanshay, who was executive director of Hebrew Foundation School (HFS) from 1979 until last year, said in an interview upon her retirement that Jewish families, whether or not they have children in the system, should be asked to contribute to some kind of community-wide fund.

Such a fund, she said, would benefit middle-income parents, in particular, who are increasingly finding it difficult to pay the fees, which at HFS, an elementary school in Dollard des Ormeaux, are now $7,000 to $8,000 a year per child.

Evie Blanshay

Blanshay, who is continuing to serve the school as a consultant, said Jewish education should be regarded as a benefit to the community as a whole, and therefore the responsibility of all its members.

"The finances are a huge obstacle, especially if you have two or three or four children. The low-income are helped and the rich don't need it. It's the middle income that is being squeezed," she said.

"And time is of the essence. Every year that [assistance is unavailable], another child goes without a Jewish education."

She believes many parents are not sending their children to a Jewish day school, or at least not enrolling them in a Jewish high school after they graduate from elementary, for financial reasons.

HFS is the only Jewish day school on the West Island, an area commonly described as a growing, younger community.

Yet, HFS' enrolment has declined from a peak of "well over 500" to 325 today, she said. The former figure included the nursery, which was an integral part of the school at that time, while the latter does not include the $7-a-day centre de la petite enfance, housed at the school.

Money is not the only obstacle, she acknowledges. "There is not the same commitment among parents to Jewish education that there was 30 years ago," she said. "In my day, there were three things you did first: get a roof over your head, put food on the table, and provide your children with a Jewish education…

"People today are not prepared to give up everything for a Jewish education. Many think an afternoon school or tutoring one or two hours a week are enough."

She emphatically does not agree.

The situation is likely only to worsen, because teachers at most Jewish schools are unionized, she said, and are paid salaries that are line with those of their public sector counterparts.

"Salaries account for 85 to 90 per cent of the budget. And there is no tax break for parents, except for a little on Judaic studies in federal taxes."

Montreal school makes changes to stem enrolment drop

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL—In its 100th year, Jewish People's and Peretz Schools and its Bialik High School (JPPS/Bialik) is overhauling its curriculum and reducing or freezing tuition in an effort to stem declining enrolment.

The school, founded on the ideals of Labour Zionism in 1913 and notable for its respect for Yiddish, will in the future be taking a more "inclusive and pluralistic" approach to Jewish identity. It will put a greater accent on Hebrew competence and add Sephardi culture in its instruction.

After a months-long consultation with parents and other "stakeholders," the board of directors on Feb. 5 announced a "new direction" for the school.

At the elementary level, JPPS will be instituting an enriched science program called S.T.I.M (Sciences, Technologie, Ingeniérie, Mathématiques), which will be taught in French, designed to meet a desire by parents, said JPPS principal Adina Matas.

Tuition is to be reduced to $5,000 for kindergarten and $6,000 for Grade 1, from the current fee of close to $8,000, she said.

Tuition will remain the same next year for the other elementary grades, and at Bialik, where fees are about $10,000.

JPPS' enrolment was particularly hard hit by confusion over a Federation CJA-endorsed plan announced two years ago to merge JPPS/Bialik and United Talmud Torahs/Herzliah High School, said Matas.

"Three years ago, we had more than 100 students more than the 350 we have now, because of the instability," said Matas. "Parents are telling us they want to know where we are going. They want things clear and transparent."

Ninety per cent of those who dropped out – many also because of the rising cost – have gone to the public system, she said.

She said the Judaic component at the elementary level won't change much, except for greater stress on speaking and reading Hebrew. Some Judaic subjects may be taught in English.

Yiddish, which has been reduced over the past decade, will be taught more for its cultural value rather than for language acquisition, Matas said.

JPPS/Bialik also hopes to stanch the drop-off after elementary school. Matas said that today, 55 to 60 per cent of JPPS graduates go on to a Jewish high school, whereas at one time, it was as high as 85 per cent.

Many parents are opting for non-Jewish private schools, and same-gender schools are especially popular right now, she said.

The big change at Bialik will be the addition – by 2014-2015 – of an international baccalaureate program for academically motivated students in grades 7 and 8, and enhancements to the French curriculum, including the opportunity for younger students in the English section to take courses intended for those whose mother tongue is French, said principal Ken Scott.

Bialik's current enrolment of just under 460 students is considerably below the peak of years ago, said Scott.

Traditional foods celebrate Purim's fun and mystery

Judy Bart Kancigor
Special to The CJN

Every Jewish school student knows the characters: Achashverosh, the foolish king; Vashti, the spurned wife; Haman, the wicked first minister; Esther, the brave and beautiful maiden; and Mordechai, her honourable protector. Their tale of intrigue is told in the Scroll of Esther (Megillah) as an annihilation plot is foiled and our people saved.

Purim, Feb. 24 this year, is the holiday of merriment, mirth and trickery. To celebrate our deliverance, sweets are the order of the day. Gifts of cakes and fruit (mishloach manot) are exchanged. For Ashkenazim, no Purim celebration would be complete without three-cornered hamantashen, traditionally filled with poppy seeds, while Sephardim enjoy honeyed pastries called oznei Haman (Haman's ears).

Bulletin! Tashen means "pockets," and Haman never wore a three-cornered hat! (You just can't believe anything you hear these days.)

Matthew Goodman, the Food Maven columnist of the Forward, says in Jewish Food: The World at Table that these Purim sweets were originally called mohntashen, meaning "poppy seed pockets." Over the years, the word morphed into hamantashen ("Haman's pockets"), which supposedly held the lots (purim) he cast in order to choose the date for the slaughter of the Jews.

Marlena Spieler offers hamantashen with three fillings in her latest cookbook, Recipes From My Jewish Grandmother (Lorenz Books), apricot, poppy seed and prune.

What is it about Purim and poppy seeds anyway? András Koerner says in A Taste of the Past: Daily Life and Cooking of a 19th-Century Hungarian Jewish Homemaker that although poppy seeds have long been associated with the holiday, they were used during Purim well before the baking of hamantashen. A religious 12th-century poem by Abraham Ibn Ezra, Koerner says, recorded the eating of poppy seeds and honey for the holiday.

On Purim we also eat dishes with a filling, "alluding to the many intrigues, secrets and surprises unfolding in the Purim story," historian and cooking expert Gil Marks writes. In addition, he says, there is a tradition that "Esther, in order to keep kosher, ate only vegetarian foods while living in the king's palace."

Marlena Spieler's Sephardi Stuffed Onions, Potatoes and Zucchini, a vegetarian stuffed dish, is therefore doubly appropriate for the holiday. "The vegetarian filling… is tomato-red, Yemenite-spiced and accented with the tart taste of lemon," she writes. "They are good served as an appetizer as well as a main course."

Spieler travelled widely as a young adult, lived in Israel for a year, and was working as an artist in Greece when she started including recipes with her drawings of food. A publisher offered to publish the recipes (minus the drawings!), launching her career as a food writer, broadcaster and columnist.

These days Spieler divides her time between San Francisco and London, where she is a frequent guest on the BBC. Her column, The Roving Feast, is carried by the New York Times syndicate and the San Francisco Chronicle.

Recipes From My Jewish Grandmother is a truly international culmination of Spieler's curiosity about our people and our food.

SEPHARDI STUFFED ONIONS, POTATOES AND ZUCCHINI

4 potatoes, peeled
4 onions, peeled
4 zucchini, halved widthwise
2-4 garlic cloves, chopped
3-4 tbsp. olive oil
3-4 tbsp. tomato paste
1/4 tsp. ras al hanout or curry powder large pinch of ground allspice seeds of 2-3 cardamom pods juice of 1/2 lemon
2-3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
6-8 tbsp. vegetable stock
salt and ground black pepper
salad to serve (optional)

Bring a large pan of salted water to a boil. Add potatoes, then onions, then zucchini to boiling water and cook until almost tender but not cooked through (about 10 minutes for potatoes, 8 minutes for onions and 4-6 minutes for zucchini). Remove vegetables from pan and cool.

Hollow out cooled vegetables. Preheat oven to 375.

Finely chop cut-out vegetable flesh and put in bowl. Add garlic, half the olive oil, tomato paste, ras al hanout or curry powder, allspice, cardamom seeds, lemon juice, parsley, salt and pepper and mix well. Fill hollowed vegetables with stuffing mixture.

Arrange stuffed vegetables in baking pan and drizzle with stock and remaining oil. Roast 35-40 minutes or until golden brown. Serve warm or cold with salad, if desired.

Pope Benedict announces that he will step down

JTA

ROME — In a shocking announcement, 85-year-old Pope Benedict XVI said Monday that he will step down from the papacy at the end of the month because he can no longer carry out his duties at his "advanced age" and with his – apparently – failing health.

Following the announcement, a spokesman for Israeli Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yona Metzger wished the Pope well and said relations between Israel and the Holy See had become the best ever during Pope Benedict's papacy.

In today's world, the Pope said Monday afternoon in a declaration in Latin issued by the Vatican, "subject to so many rapid changes and shaken by questions of deep relevance for the life of faith, in order to govern the bark of Saint Peter and proclaim the Gospel, both strength of mind and body are necessary, strength which in the last few months, has deteriorated in me to the extent that I have had to recognize my incapacity to adequately fulfil the ministry entrusted to me."

The declaration continued, saying that Pope Benedict, "well aware of the seriousness of this act and with full freedom," renounced the papacy "entrusted" to him by the cardinals on April 19, 2005, and will no longer be Pope as of Feb. 28.

Though the Pope's brother told the German news agency DPA that Benedict had been weighing the decision for months, the announcement came as a shock. This is the first resignation of a reigning pope in modern times. The last pope to resign was Gregory XII in 1415, who was trying to end a civil war within the church.

The former Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger was elected Pope after the death of Polish-born Pope John Paul II. John Paul had made bettering relations with the Jewish world and Israel one of the cardinal points of his papacy.

Rabbi Metzger praised Pope Benedict's outreach to Jews and other religious groups during his tenure. "During his period, there were the best relations ever between the church and the chief rabbinate and we hope that this trend will continue," Reuters quoted Rabbi Metzger's spokesman as saying. "I think he deserves a lot of credit for advancing inter-religious links the world over between Judaism, Christianity and Islam." He wished Pope Benedict "good health and long days."

The FCJE, the umbrella organization representing Spanish Jews, said in a statement issued shortly after the announcement that it "respected" the Pope's decision.

"As pope, Benedict XVI acted with great intellectual rigour that undoubtedly contributed to Catholic-Jewish relations," the statement read. "We wish the Pope a long life and encourage him to continue working for peace between peoples after leaving the post."

A man of 'vision and action'

After serving as a congregational rabbi in the Bronx, N.Y., from 1955 to 1960, Rabbi Hartman accepted the position of spiritual leader at a predecessor shul of what later became Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem in Montreal. While serving as rabbi, he also taught and studied at McGill University and received his PhD in philosophy.

In 1971, Rabbi Hartman immigrated to Israel with his family, a move he viewed as an essential part of his mission to encourage a greater understanding between Jews of diverse affiliations – both in Israel and the Diaspora. In 1976, he founded the Shalom Hartman Institute for Advanced Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, dedicating it to his father.

The institute serves as a centre for scholars in the study and education of classical Jewish sources and contemporary issues of Israeli society and Jewish life. It administers two high schools, the Charles E. Smith High School for Boys on the institute campus, and, more recently, a girls' high school, also in Jerusalem, as well as other learning programs.

Rabbi Hartman served as a professor of Jewish thought at Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where he taught for more than two decades. He was also a visiting professor of Jewish thought at the University of California at Berkeley in 1986-87 and at the University of California at Los Angeles in 1997-98. As an author, he won two National Jewish Book Awards, for studies on Maimonides and on innovation in traditional Judaism.

He was awarded the Avi Chai Award (2000), the Yakir Yerushalayim Award (2001), the Hebrew University's Rothberg Award for Jewish Education (2004), and honorary doctorates from Yale University, Hebrew Union College and the Weizmann Institute of Science, the latter of which recognized "his life's work to revitalize Judaism and strengthen Jewish identity among Jews the world over; above all, of his gift of vision and action, faith and scholarship, toward building a more pluralistic, tolerant and enlightened Israeli society."

From 1977 to 1984, Rabbi Hartman served as an adviser to education minister Zevulun Hammer, and he has been adviser to a number of prime ministers on the subject of religious pluralism in Israel and the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora.

He is survived by his ex-wife, Barbara Hartman, and their five children.

10 women arrested at Western Wall

JTA

JERUSALEM — Ten women participating in a women's prayer service with hundreds of worshippers and supporters at the Western Wall were arrested for wearing prayer shawls.

Those arrested Monday morning included Israeli-American Rabbi Susan Silverman, sister of comedian Sarah Silverman, and her 17-year-old daughter Hallel Abramovitz; Anat Hoffman, chairwoman of the Women of the Wall, who has been arrested several times in recent months, and two U.S. rabbis, Debra Cantor of B'nai Tikvoh-Sholom in Bloomfield, Conn., and Robin Fryer Bodzin of the Israel Center of Conservative Judaism in Queens, N.Y.

The women had gathered at the back of the women's section, as they have at the beginning of every new Jewish month since 1988, for Rosh Chodesh services for the new Jewish month of Adar. It was the largest number of participants for the monthly event since its inception, organizers told Israeli media.

The women were joined on the other side of the mechitzah, the barrier that separates the sexes at the Wall, by a number of male supporters, including six former Israel Defence Forces paratroopers who had been among those that liberated the Western Wall during the Six Day War in 1967. One of the paratroopers was Yitzhak Yifat of Jerusalem, who is famous as one of the three paratroopers in the iconic photograph of three soldiers standing at the Western Wall shortly after its liberation. Yifat is the middle paratrooper in the photo by David Rubinger.

The arrests reportedly were made at the end of the service, after most of the participants and media had left the Western Wall Plaza. Police had stood on the sidelines as the women prayed and then danced in a circle holding their prayer shawls, according to Ha'aretz.

The women's prayer group moved its Torah reading from the Wall to outside the Old City of Jerusalem police department, where the arrested women were taken.

In 2003, Israel's Supreme Court upheld a government ban on women wearing tfillin or tallit prayer shawls, or reading from a Torah scroll at the Western Wall.

Women participating in the Rosh Chodesh service have been arrested nearly every month since June for wearing prayer shawls or for "disturbing public order."

Missiles 'pose a very big problem'

On Saturday, the Lebanese army said Israeli "spy drones" had clocked more than 17 hours over Lebanese territory in the past day.

Yadlin told the paper that Israel was looking out for four types of weapons: ballistic rockets, air-defence arms, land-to-sea missiles and chemical weapons.

Hezbollah reportedly already holds some of these weapons within Syrian territory, but cannot move them without risking Israeli action.

Yadlin said that the risk of escalation became greater as President Bashar Assad's rule grew more tenuous.

"As the Syrian army becomes weaker and Hezbollah grows more isolated because of the loss of its Syrian patron, it makes sense that this will continue," he said.

Israel has denied foreign media reports that it hit a weapons convoy or a research site outside Damascus late last month, though officials have hinted at Jerusalem's involvement. According to some reports, Israeli planes hit a convoy of Russian-made SA-17 anti-aircraft missiles on the way from Syria to Lebanon. Syria reported that a research site at Jamarya, north of the capital, had been struck, and footage from the site seemed to show a bombed-out building and charred vehicles, including what appeared to be a transport vehicle for an SA-17 battery.

An unnamed military official told the Washington Post that the anti-aircraft missile could "pose a very big problem for the Israeli air force.

"There are more tangible indications that such weapons could reach Lebanon," as the fighting continues, the official said.

Yadlin, who now heads the Institute for National Security Studies, told a security conference last week that Israel would likely come out more secure after the dust settled from the Syrian civil war.

Former Supreme Court justice dies

JTA

JERUSALEM — Rabbi Menachem Elon, a former Israeli Supreme Court justice and an Israel Prize winner, has died.

Rabbi Elon, who served on the high court from 1977 until his retirement as deputy chief justice in 1993, died on Feb. 6 in Israel. He was 89.

He was renowned as an expert on the subject of the applicability of Jewish civil law in a Jewish state. In 1973, he published a book on Jewish civil law that is considered an important work in the field.

In 1979, Rabbi Elon was awarded the Israel Prize for Hebrew law.

Rabbi Elon was born Menachem Fetter in Dusseldorf, Germany. His family fled to the Netherlands in 1932 before immigrating to then-Palestine in 1935.

He studied at the non-Zionist Hebron yeshiva, but was attracted to the religious-Zionist movement and became one of the founders of the religious kibbutz Tirat Tzvi in the Beit Shean Valley. He was ordained as a rabbi and served in the Israel Defence Forces as a military prosecutor.

Rabbi Elon worked as a law professor and a professor of Hebraic and Jewish law at Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In 1983, he lost to Chaim Herzog in his bid to be president of Israel.

Cdn. citizen one of two suspects in Bulgarian attack

JTA

A Canadian man with links to the terrorist organization Hezbollah was one of two people implicated in a terrorist attack in Bulgaria that killed six, including five Israelis, a Bulgarian official said last week.

Hezbollah also financed the bomb attack on a tour bus full of Israelis last July, Bulgaria's Foreign Minister Tsvetan Tsvetanov told reporters on Feb. 5, following a six-hour cabinet meeting.

The people directly behind the attack were part of a Hezbollah cell that included two operatives using passports from Australia and Canada.

"I can confirm that the individual in question is a dual national who resides in Lebanon," Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird told reporters Feb. 5.

"Canada commends Bulgaria for its thorough investigation of last summer's heinous attack in Burgas," Baird said. "That Bulgaria has found convincing evidence of Hezbollah involvement in this carnage is, sadly, not surprising. It is yet more evidence of the depravity of Hezbollah. We urge the European Union and all partners who have not already done so to list Hezbollah as a terrorist entity and prosecute terrorist acts committed by this inhumane organization to the fullest possible extent."

Unveiling the results of the six-month inquiry in Sofia on Feb. 5, Tsvetanov said: "We have established that the two were members of the militant wing of Hezbollah," adding: "There is data showing the financing and connection between Hezbollah and the two suspects." The pair had lived in Lebanon since 2006 and 2010 respectively, the AFP news agency quoted Tsvetanov as saying.

On Feb. 6, Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism told CTV News that the alleged Canadian accomplice first immigrated to Canada when he was eight, obtained citizeship "about three or four years after that" and then returned to Lebanon at age 12.

He said the individual had returned to Canada on a few occasions since then but was not "a habitual" resident of the country.

In the wake of accusations that it was involved in the Burgas terror attack, Iran is recalling its ambassador to Bulgaria.

Iran also reportedly will downgrade its relations with Bulgaria, according to reports.

Last Friday, Iran's ambassador to Bulgaria denied Iranian involvement in the attack.

"This has nothing to do with Iran," Gholamreza Bageri told reporters. "We are against any form of terrorism and strongly condemn such actions."

Iran has accused Israel of staging the attack. Israel has blamed Hezbollah and Iran.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu thanked Bulgaria for its investigation and findings in a statement on Feb. 5 and asked the EU to finally list Hezbollah as a terrorist entity.

"There is only one Hezbollah, a single organization with the same leadership."

He added: "The attack in Burgas was on European soil against a member of the European Union. We hope the Europeans will draw the necessary conclusions as to Hezbollah's true nature."

AMIA objects to truth commission with Iran

JTA

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — The president of the AMIA Buenos Aires Jewish centre said the truth commission agreed to by Argentina and Iran "will allow a third bombing in Argentina.

"This pact is viewed by some people as a step forward. This may be a step to the precipice," Guillermo Borger said. "It will allow a very unfortunate third attack."

The confrontation between Borger and Argentinian President Cristina Fernandez came to a head on Saturday as Fernandez took to the national television airwaves and Twitter to defend the deal.

"I read with concern the statements made by Guillermo Borger, president of AMIA, on deal with Iran. What do you know to make a statement so terrible?" Fernandez asked on Twitter. "If there was an attack planned related to the agreement with Iran, who is the mastermind and the material author?"

Argentina's senate will be the first legislative chamber to discuss the memorandum of understanding signed Jan. 27 with Iran on the 1994 AMIA bombing, which killed 85 and wounded hundreds. Fernandez has summoned the Argentinian congress to a special session Feb. 28 on the pact, which would create a truth commission allowing judges to question Iran's suspects in Tehran.

Borger is strongly rejecting the agreement, relating it to new dangers to Argentina, after expressing satisfaction with the pact following a meeting with Foreign Minister Hector Timerman at the AMIA building on Jan. 29. Other Jewish leaders and victims' families also were in the meeting with Timerman.

When the announcement of the memorandum was made, Borger said he was opposed because "we don't trust Iran."

Israel and the United States have objected to meetings between Argentina and Iran, and the bilateral agreement.

Boycott of SodaStream could hurt Palestinians

Ben Sales
JTA

MA'ALE ADUMIM — For proponents of the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement (BDS), SodaStream would appear to be a straightforward target.

The Israeli company, which sells a popular kitchen gadget that turns tap water into carbonated drinks, has a large factory in a West Bank settlement. When SodaStream announced that it would run an ad during the Super Bowl, the pro-Palestinian boycott campaign against the company reached a fever pitch.

But for hundreds of Palestinians, SodaStream isn't a target – it's their employer.

On a recent afternoon, women wearing hijabs hurried to their shifts at the plant in Ma'ale Adumim, a suburban settlement about 15 minutes west of Jerusalem. Some 500 West Bank Palestinians work at the site, in addition to 400 Arabs from eastern Jerusalem and a mix of 200 Israeli Jews and foreign workers, including refugees from Africa.

The Ma'ale Adumim factory has an on-site mosque and synagogue, and Jewish and Arab employees share the same dining hall. SodaStream has two other facilities in Israel, one in Ashkelon, the other in the Galilee town of Mount Tabor. The Galilee factory employs several hundred Israeli Arabs.

"Everyone works together: Palestinians, Russians, Jews," a Palestinian employee named Rasim at the Ma'ale Adumim site told JTA. Rasim has worked at the plant for four months and asked that his last name not be published. "Everything is OK. I always work with Jews. Everyone works together, so of course we're friends."

For SodaStream CEO Daniel Birnbaum, treating Arabs and Jews equally is a doctrine, not a convenience.

"We practise equality and full co-operation both on the job and off it," Birnbaum told the Arab publication Al Monitor in a recent interview.

When he was invited to the Israeli president's residence recently to receive an award, Birnbaum brought with him a few Palestinian employees and insisted on undergoing the same rigorous security checks to which they were subjected, Birnbaum told Al Monitor. When it came time for Birnbaum's speech, he broke with protocol and publicly upbraided his host, President Shimon Peres, for the unequal treatment that his Palestinian workers had received, including strip searches down to their underwear.

The SodaStream factory in Ma'ale Adumim (Flash90 photo)

"We are committed to continue serving as a bridge and to sowing hope," Birnbaum said in his speech. "Who knows as well as you, Mr. Peres, how important it is to remain optimistic that one day, there will be peace?"

SodaStream's case, some say, is one example of how boycotting an Israeli company doing business in the West Bank can end up hurting the very goals that boycott proponents say they are trying to achieve: Palestinian rights and Israeli-Palestinian peace.

"The SodaStream situation is extremely complicated because it's a clear case of where the owners are making real efforts to engage the Palestinian workers with fair wages and in management positions," said Kenneth Bob, president of the liberal Zionist group Ameinu, which supports the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank but still opposes boycotts of settlement products.

"At the same time, it does on some level strengthen the occupation because it's a factory over the Green Line," the boundary between Israel and the West Bank, he added.

Advocates of BDS say supporting SodaStream amounts to supporting Israel's occupation of the West Bank and that boycotting the company is an effective way to support Palestinian national aspirations.

"In the absence of global and international political pressure for Israel to abide by international law, BDS hopes to use nonviolent pressure to get Israel to stop the occupation," said Kristin Szremski, a spokesperson for the Interfaith Boycott Committee, a pro-BDS group. "The boycott of SodaStream felt like it was a great opportunity to raise awareness about settlements and thwart SodaStream's effort to get into the American market."

Szremski dismissed the argument that hurting SodaStream could hurt the livelihood of Palestinians, calling it "a way to obfuscate" the issue.

"The point is not just to make SodaStream go out of business," Szremski told JTA. "Were there no settlements to begin with, Palestinians could be working their own lands. The fact that a worker goes to work every day does not indicate that it is a good thing."

Another Palestinian worker at SodaStream's West Bank site, who gave his name as Mmdoh, said politics don't enter the workplace.

"We don't get into that," said Mmdoh, 34. "I feel normal. I don't have conversations about it."

For its part, SodaStream sees growth on the horizon. Its Super Bowl ad cost about $3.7 million, according to Ad Age, and won notice not just for its exploding bottles of brand-name sodas, but because a version of the ad highlighting digs at Pepsi and Coca-Cola was rejected by CBS, which broadcast the game.

New Delhi university hosts conference on Hebrew

Compiled by CJN Staff

Jawaharlal Nehru University in New Delhi broke new ground when it became the first South Asian institution of higher learning to host a conference on the Hebrew language.

A three-day inter-disciplinary conference on Hebrew Language and Culture: Reception, Self Conception and Intercultural Relations was held from Jan. 28 to 30 under the auspices of the school's Centre of Arabic and African Studies, School of Language, Literature and Culture Studies. It was largely organized by Muslim scholars, according to a report in the Weekly Press Pakistan website.

Thirty-nine scholars from a dozen Indian and Israeli institutions presented papers in 16 parallel sessions.

In a keynote address, Israeli Ambassador Alon Ushpiz said, "The impressive depth of the discussions in the conference is a mirror image of the academic passion found in Israel for Indian culture, heritage, history and languages. The key to our mutual academic fascination is the fact that both Israel and India have managed to preserve their ancient heritage while constantly moving forward with the rapidly changing world."

Conference participants said they hoped the event would generate greater interest in Hebrew among Indians.

Tech accelerator helps olim find success in Israel

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Things can get lonely when you're the new kid in town, and for immigrant entrepreneurs looking to start a new business in Israel, loneliness isn't the only problem.

Business is all about connections, and it can take a very long time to build up a network of mentors, customers, lawyers, bankers and supporters who can share their resources to help build success.

What immigrant entrepreneurs need is a shortcut, and that's exactly what they find at The Hive, an accelerator that caters specifically to new immigrants in Israel. The accelerator provides all the usual support services – work spaces, mentors, advice and planning – but for new olim, those services take on a much more important role in the success of their business than they do for native Israelis, who already know how to negotiate the system in Israel.

New olim have much to contribute to Israel, said Cynthia Phitoussi, co-director and founder of The Hive.

"The immigrants in our program give as much as they get," she told The Times of Israel. "Western olim have great ideas on solving problems that Israelis should be listening to, ideas that have great potential for the economy of Israel."

To that end, Gvahim, a non-profit that helps new immigrants find jobs and build careers in Israel, started The Hive early last year. The first round included eight companies. The second round, which ended last month, had 10.

Phitoussi said the first round, which ended last May, was an unqualified success. "Five of the eight start-up programs have already raised funds, launched their product, recruited staff, formed partnerships and show significant sales."

Not only do the ideas and projects started by olim from North America, South America, and Europe help the Israeli economy, Phitoussi said, the can-do spirit of western entrepreneurs trying to make it in Israel, against many odds, is a great lesson in Zionism for native Israelis as well.

Recently, The Hive ran a special "graduation event" for investors, enabling the program members to pitch their ideas in the hope of getting on the radar of VCs and angels. Ten start-ups began the second round of The Hive's accelerator program last August, but only one could be chosen as the top start-up by investors: SmartLive, which provides a platform for better and more efficient customer service for companies.

Advertising agency plans office in Israel's 'deep south'

David Shamah
Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Lots of companies talk about "developing the periphery," but the Israeli branch of the international McCann Erickson advertising agency is actually doing something about it. And not just in the "comfortable" periphery, such as Be'er Sheva. McCann Digital Israel is opening up a full-fledged ad agency in Mitzpeh Ramon, the "deepest" of the deep Israeli south.

It's a place Israelis flock to for hiking, horseback riding, and animal watching – the kind of place where you could imagine Abraham and Isaac shepherding their flocks. One of Israel's greatest natural wonders, Mitzpeh Ramon (the Ramon Crater) is a geological formation 85 kilometres south of Be'er Sheva caused by millions of years of erosion. It's a centre of tourism in the deep Negev, with more than a half-dozen hotels and bed and breakfasts. Besides tourism, the town's other major industry is quarrying Jerusalem stone. Among the Tourism Ministry's plans for the region is construction of a landing strip for light planes, making it easier for tourists from the centre of the country and Eilat to tour the area.

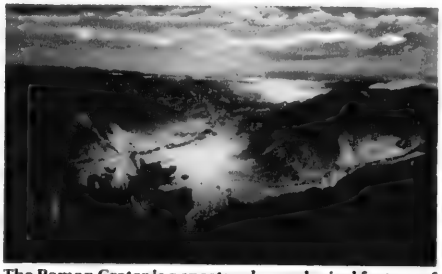
High tech, though, was not on the agenda of any of the government ministries and agencies helping to promote Mitzpeh Ramon. But that's exactly what McCann is doing, with the establishment of the McCann Valley Center for Digital Marketing and New Media. The office is being inaugurated this month with the assistance of McCann Worldwide and Michal Romi, a local entrepreneur.

The office, McCann Digital Israel said, will offer new media services for small and medium businesses all over Israel. Among those services will be management of Facebook and Twitter campaigns (in Hebrew, Arabic, and Russian); branding and design services; building of websites, and social-media advertising campaigns.

The plan is to hire dozens of people over the next few years, until – by 2018 – the office employs 120 people directly, as well as an additional 120 outside service personnel. And McCann Israel isn't opening an office in Mitzpeh Ramon in order to "farm out" back-office work to a group of "discount" employees. The organization is committed to paying the Mitzpeh Ramon staff the same salaries they would be making in Tel Aviv, McCann Israel said.

It's expected that most of the employees will come from Mitzpeh Ramon and other deep-Negev towns. The company plans to open a six-month training program to get qualified candidates (college graduates with some computer experience) up to speed on digital media. The Ministry of Industry, Labor and Trade will help shoulder the cost of the training, but McCann Israel will be responsible for salaries after the program.

The new office, housed in a set of renovated apartments in Mitzpeh Ramon's residential quarter, is set to open later this month, with McCann Israel paying for the refurbishing. At a later stage, the company will go in together with the Ministry for the Development of the Galilee and Negev for construction of a proper office, which will be, the Ministry and McCann hope, the centre of Mitzpeh Ramon's tech quarter.



The Ramon Crater is a spectacular geological feature of Israel's Negev desert and is considered the world's largest erosion cirque or machtesh. [Flash 90 photo]

The Ministry for the Development of the Galilee and Negev has taken upon itself the development of affordable housing for workers, said current minister Silvan Shalom. The project, he said, combines "pioneering and entrepreneurship, two important ways to develop the periphery."

While there are many worthy development projects going on in the Negev, Shalom said, this one is special.

"We expect the project to have an important influence on the region, because it offers local jobs, and encourages people to move to the south. We plan to continue working with McCann Erickson throughout the entire project," he added.

Hana Rado, chief operating officer of McCann Israel, said, "We see in Mitzpeh Ramon, and in the entire Negev, an ideal place to build a high-quality, professional community. Even now, at the very beginning of the McCann Valley project, we are amazed to see the level of interest from government officials, as well as from local residents, who see the project as an engine of economic development for the region.

"We hope that the project will provide a wide range of opportunities for young professionals in the south, for Israelis from other areas who wish to work and live there, and for businesses that are searching for challenges, with our objective being the motivating of others to open businesses in Mitzpeh Ramon and the rest of the Negev."

Historical Israeli play echoes modern themes

The cast of Mifgash Theatre's A Night in May [Tali Dubrovsky photo]

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Mifgash Theatre will be bringing to Toronto a play about a family in Jerusalem on May 22, 1967, shortly before the Six Day War.

The play, called A Night in May, is written by Israeli novelist and playwright A. B. Yehoshua.

It has been very successful in Israel at the Habima Theatre in Tel Aviv, said Galya Sarner, director of the Israeli Canadian Project at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. She said it's an honour to produce this play for a Canadian audience.

"We believe it will reflect in a very respectful way the typical Israeli family relationship in Israel despite the fact that it's about 1967, a long time ago," Sarner said, adding that it will give Canadians a very realistic picture of Israeli daily life. "The tension, the stress... unfortunately, it does reflect today."

This is the fifth year Mifgash Theatre has been producing Hebrew plays for a Canadian audience. The theatre aims to integrate Israeli immigrants into the Canadian Jewish community through sharing arts and culture. The Hebrew-language theatre company is part of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre's Hamifgash program.

"Mifgash" translates into "meeting place," which Sarner said directly references Toronto. "Literally, we took the name and in many ways it can reflect our vision of putting together a Hebrew-speaking community theatre," she said.

Over the past five years, their productions have consistently drawn large crowds from the local Jewish community, but also people who aren't Jewish and simply love Israeli arts, she said.

Although A Night in May will be performed in its original Hebrew, there will be English subtitles to make it an inclusive production.

The cast of the production inclues a mix of professional theatre actors and volunteers. Despite their varying backgrounds, they all share a love of art, Sarner said, adding that the theatre has grown and changed throughout the years.

Passages: Varda Hall Berenstein, a professionally trained singer and choir conductor who died recently in Toronto at age 91, was born in Basel, Switzerland, in 1921. During World War II, she travelled to refugee camps and sang for the relatively few Jews who, in fleeing the Nazis, had been allowed into Switzerland.

Berenstein was the first person to sing Israeli songs on Swiss national radio and, after arriving in Toronto in 1949, sang on CBC radio and TV in the 1950s and 1960s. She performed Yiddish and Israeli songs on many occasions for Jewish communities across Canada. One of her fondest memories was singing for then-prime minister Lester Pearson at a Negev Dinner in Montreal.

Berenstein was the first music teacher for the Associated Hebrew Schools and had extensive musical credits within Toronto's Jewish community. She conducted the Hadassah-WIZO choir for many years, as well as choirs at Adath Israel and Beth Sholom synagogues. More recently, she conducted the Chai Singers, a small vocal chorale of senior citizens.

Until her last weeks, she was an engaging and dynamic educator, an advocate for Israeli and Yiddish music, and an oral historian about Jews in Switzerland. Until recently she taught an informal course in her home on "Learning Yiddish Through Songs" and gave talks on "Yiddish Folksongs and the Legacy of Mordechai Gebirtig." Just two months ago she spoke to the Jewish Genealogical Society of Toronto on "Growing Up as a Jew in Switzerland, 1921 to 1949." She was also a regular in the Yiddish Vinkl, a circle of Yiddishists who meet downtown monthly.

She was predeceased by her husband, Isidore Berenstein, with whom she worked as the Canadian representative of Rodenstock, a German optical company. She leaves behind daughter Rhona Berens and stepson Ilan Levy, their partners and two grandchildren.

Two fine movies from the Toronto Film Society

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Jewish Film Society, based at the Miles Nadel JCC, is bringing two fine British movies to town on Feb.17 at its Al Green Theatre venue.

The Barber of Stamford Hill, a 64-minute feature film, will be followed by The 10th Man, a 10-minute short. They will be screened at 4 p.m. and again at 7:30 p.m.

The Barber of Stamford Hill, directed by Casper Wrede and written by Ronald Harwood, is a warm-hearted character study set in London in the early 1960s. It's about a lonely Jewish bachelor who pretends to be a married man with two children.

Figg (John Bennett), 50, is an affable chap who regales customers with stories and aphorisms. The man is loquacious, and as he goes off on a tangent about the dying art of shaving, he launches into a soliloquy about the importance of family and the tradition of Friday night Sabbath dinners.

Figg, beautifully portrayed by Bennett, is in fact imagining a life that has tragically eluded him so far.

On Friday evenings, after the business week has ended, he leaves his shop and catches a bus back to his house, an extremely modest flat where no one awaits him with a smile, a hug or a sumptuous hot dinner.

The only person with whom he can share a meal on Friday nights is a speaking-impaired bachelor, Dober (Maxwell Shaw), who plays a mean game of chess.

But as much as he enjoys Dober's company, Figg longs for something more.

"I'm the kind of fella who should have married," he says plaintively. "A home – this is what a man needs."

As Figg, Bennett is a marvel, conveying conviviality and vulnerability in a single sentence or gesture.

On an impulse, he visits Mrs. Werner (Megs Jenkins), a widow across the street with two children whose husband died a decade ago. They chat, munching on cream cheese sandwiches, and their conversation is about family.

John Bennett and Megs Jenkins in a scene from The Barber of Stamford Hill.

"You should find yourself a nice girl and settle down," she says coyly. Her meaning is clear, but it escapes Figg.

When she suggests they should go out dancing, he lamely claims he is busy. Unperturbed by his obtuseness, she tosses a compliment his way. "You would make a good family man." He remains untouched by her overture.

Figg knows he's hopeless. "You can't teach an old dog new tricks," he muses as he talks with Dober, played excellently by Shaw.

Wrede directs this black-and-white film with a steady hand and an observant eye, keeping it firm and crisp.

Sam Leifer's The 10th Man unfolds in a London synagogue as nine elderly men scramble to find a 10th to form a minyan.

Two of the worshippers leave the shul in search of the missing man, but the only person they manage to waylay is a Communist whose atheism shines clearly through.

They return to the synagogue, mission unaccomplished. "I couldn't find any strays," grumbles one of the searchers.

Much to their astonishment, someone finally turns up, but the stranger defies their expectations.

Wry and sly, The 10th Man complements The Barber of Stamford Hill exceedingly well.

Theatre will produce show for youngsters

"Every year, we have new faces, new volunteers," Sarner said. "I'm getting those phone calls, emails on a regular basis from people who want to support and take part."

New for this year, Mifgash Theatre will produce a show with young actors aged seven to 14, which expands the company's mission of engaging and reaching out to the Israeli and Jewish communities, ensuring that everybody feels welcome and comfortable.

The children will perform in the play The Diary of Anne Frank. While the show will be in English, it still fulfils Mifgash Theatre's goals because it will help these kids identify with various aspects of Jewish history, values and thought, Sarner said.

"We chose this play because it features a young heroine that the program's participants and young audience should be able to form an emotional bond with," she said.

Additionally, through the workshops, participants will learn other aspects of producing a play, including set design and lighting.

The children's performance, which has a cast of 20 kids, will open in May.

Meanwhile, audiences will be able to see some of the young actors in A Night in May.

The show runs on Feb. 23 and 24 at Vaughan City Playhouse Theatre. For tickets, visit mifgash.ca or call 905-764-7817.

In the article "Tarragon presents a Moscovitch double bill" (Feb.7), Paul Lampert and Nikki Landau were identified as co-directors of the play Other People's Children. In fact, while they are both co-artistic directors of Theatre PANIK, only Lampert directed the play. The CJN regrets the error.

Max Layton follows in his father's footsteps

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

For Max Layton, the rapture has come.

The 66-year-old son of iconic Canadian poet Irving Layton, Max Layton – despite decades spent trying to avoid becoming a poet – has become just that. What's more, he's now a published poet.

Last autumn, Toronto-based Guernica Editions brought out a slim volume of Layton's verse. At a mere 50 poems (of about 100 he wrote), When the Rapture Comes is deceptive. While each poem begins with the words "when the rapture comes," the results take the reader to 50 different places, each inhabiting its own quirky, funny, poignant universe.

For example: "When the rapture comes, my father, who died of Alzheimer's, will remember me." And: "When the rapture comes, you who so often predicted it will be the most surprised."

They go on from there, meandering into the full palette of human emotions and foibles. In taut, crystalline words, the poet, like a jazz musician riffing on a well-worn melody, explores vindictiveness, passion, melancholy, hope and lament. There's even some juvenile humour.

Layton is clear on something: the book does not refer to any Christian-style end-times scenario.

Rapture "is just a metaphor for the end of anything... the end of the world, or my own personal life, or the end of our civilization," he said on the phone from his home in Cheltenham, Ont.

By way of elaborating, he deploys another metaphor: "If you put a diamond necklace on a black background, the colours in the diamond sparkle more brightly. And death is a kind of black background against which we live out our lives. It gives our lives colour and meaning."

Layton insists this is not morbid. Rather, he argues that his inaugural effort explores ambivalent attitudes toward death.

"If you really live forever, if there really was a heaven to which you went forever, there would be no purpose, absolutely no meaning to anything that you did," he said. "No act of heroism would mean anything because you couldn't die anyway.

"The only thing that gives actual meaning to our lives is the fact that whatever we do with our life is against the backdrop of the blackness, the nothingness of death."

He puts a Jewish spin on it for the benefit of CJN readers.

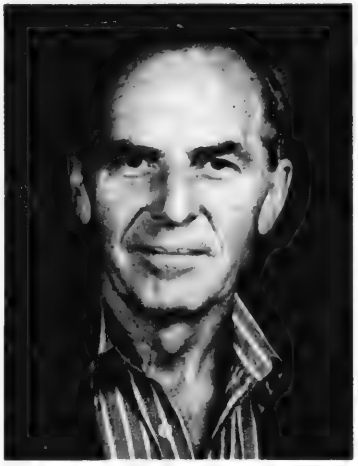
"Most Jews do not believe in an actual heaven. They do not believe that you will be bodily resurrected into some sort of eternal heaven. So, what gives life meaning for Jews? The answer, precisely, is that you really only have one life and it's right here on this earth. And everything you do is against the backdrop that you're going to die and that's the end of you. The only thing that gives your life meaning is doing something which you're proud of while you're alive. And then you can face death with equanimity."

Not all the poems explore death or nothingness. Layton also captures a kind of alternate universe where the end of days will usher in a kind of golden age: "When the rapture comes, seraphs will sing with dybbuks and demons," offers an especially spiritual poem, titled Choose. "Everybuddy will call everybuddy bro; Arabs will stop being anti-Semitic."

For all that, he "tried desperately not to be a poet," Layton confessed to an interviewer last summer. "I never wanted to be a writer – at least not the way I wanted to be a logger or a car mechanic or a decent, faithful lover. All those things require an act of will. They are things that one becomes. But being a writer was what I was – behind everything else, informing everything I did – even if I never wrote a line."

Layton's life reads like the stereotypical poet's. He was born in Montreal in 1946 and his parents split up when he was 13. By 16, he was living in a decrepit rooming house with alcoholics and outcasts after his mother and sister moved to California.

After high school, he worked a variety of jobs that would mould his artistic temperament – at a British Columbia lumber camp, laying track in Saskatchewan, picking tobacco and apprenticing as a car mechanic (playing his guitar in coffee houses and on street corners whenever he got the chance. As a child, he had learned some chords from no less than Leonard Cohen).



Max Layton

Settling in Toronto with a BA in English and philosophy, and a new wife, he owned a bookstore, managed a subsidiary of McClelland & Stewart, was a banker and ran his own publishing house. After earning a master's degree in English literature, he wrote a novel (Some Kind of Hero) and a book of short stories, and took a long-term job as an English teacher at a Mississauga high school.

At one point, a degenerative eye disease rendered him legally blind. "I couldn't read anymore. I couldn't even watch TV," he recalled. "The only thing I could do was go into my own room and close the door and pick up my guitar. Suddenly in my grief, all kinds of songs started pouring out of me. And that's a kind of poetry."

Heartbeat of Time, a CD of his songs, came out in 2010. "It loosened up the poetic muscle," he said.

"Going blind is a bit like dying," he said, sounding morbid again. But the return of his eyesight was "a very, very miraculous thing. It was like getting a second life."

Asked if he ever showed an early poem of his to his famous father, the son told a bittersweet story.

"I remember it with tremendous affection. My father and I had been estranged for many years. He would come to Montreal to visit. We would meet in a restaurant and talk. Fantastic conversations would go for hours and hours. We'd have one coffee after another.

"One of those times, I brought a poem I had written. I was very proud of it. He very generously went through every single line and showed how if I changed this or that, the poem would be better. He explained his reasoning... the general principles behind the fixing. I was deeply appreciative, but, at the same time, the poem wasn't mine anymore."

He never showed his father another of his poems "because then they wouldn't be mine."

And what would Irving Layton think of Max's new collection?

"I think he would actually really like them. They're clean and they speak to people. They're not navel-gazing. They have a wider purpose and meaning, and they're designed to be read by ordinary people. You don't need a big vocabulary to understand my poems. The poems are witty. There's humour in here. Far from being pessimistic, there's a good laugh in a lot of these poems.

"I think my father would have liked that very much."

Deadline for submissions is February 28, 2013.
We can only accept e-mail submissions

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Maccabi Canada's soccer program growing fast

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

In a symbolic passing of the torch from one generation to the next, the first ever "elite" Maccabi youth team took on their parents in a friendly end-of-season game.

The contest marked the closing chapter for a auspicious first year for Team Maccabi 2002 (the date refers to the players' year of birth).

Team Maccabi 2002 finished the last six months of the year without a loss. That included playing at least five of the top 10 teams in the province. They finished the year winning the SAAC (Soccer Academy Alliance of Canada) fall tournament, not conceding a goal in five games.

The 2002 team also won the Toronto indoor futsal championship after capturing the league title and was a finalist in the March break indoor competition at the Downsview Hangar.

Not bad for a soccer program that only got off the ground in 2009. Back then, Maccabi Canada joined forces with JCC Chai Sports to create a soccer program aimed at Jewish youngsters in the Greater Toronto Area. Maccabi Soccer is affiliated with the Prosserman JCC and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre.

Starting with a recreational house league that attracted 41 kids, the Maccabi Soccer Club now offers programs in recreational, elite development and rep levels in the SAAC, said Alex Voihanski, managing director of JCC Chai Sports.

The recreational program has grown to more than 400 kids, while the elite and SAAC academy groups bring in another 100 or more. The goal is to attract at least 600 youngsters for the spring and summer sessions, which kick off in April and run through to October, Voihanski said.

While the majority of kids play at a recreational "house league" level, there has been growing interest in the "academy" model.

House leagues "place more of an emphasis on winning, tournaments and games," Voihanski said.

The academy approach focuses on players' skill development and is something like the European approach to soccer, he added.

Maccabi soccer's 2003 team, with head coach Vince Coletta

Kids enrolled in the Maccabi academy program practise three or four times a week and play one game. Even the younger academy players, five and six year olds, practice two or three times a week followed by a game.

The academy provides a natural outlet for youngsters who want to continue to progress as soccer players and play on Jewish teams, he continued. More than half of Maccabi's SAAC team graduated from house league play.

"We didn't want the kids to go somewhere else. We wanted them to stay in our system and develop there and keep them within the larger Jewish community organizations," Voihanski said.

"We get a lot of kids from different backgrounds – Argentines, South Africans, Israelis and Russians," he continued. "That's the passion they have and now they are able to get involved in our program.

"Our MO is building community one game at a time… It's a different part of community-building and one that a lot of people find is fun," he added.

Coaching and instruction are a big part of the program's allure: Jamie Teixeira serves as technical director, while Henrich Svetko is the senior technical adviser.

The list of coaches is likewise impressive: longtime Maccabi Canada athlete Jason Mausberg coaches the boys, along with Gil Vainshtein, Kilian Elkinson, Ilya Orlov, Oliver Spring, and Tomer Chencinski.

Vainshtein was captain of the Maccabi Canada team that competed in the Pan American Maccabi Games last year in Brazil. Elkinson plays for the University of Toronto Blues and was a former TFC reserve player. Orlov represented Canada at the World University Games. Spring was CSL reserve defender of the year last season and is spending the year in Israel, where he is finalizing a contract with a top Israeli club. Chencinski is a professional goalkeeper who has played for TFC as well as the top professional leagues in Finland and Sweden, and has just signed with Maccabi Tel Aviv.

Team Maccabi also fields an adult team that has been quite successful. The team has racked up two indoor league titles and one league cup title. Currently, the indoor team has 10 players who were chosen to go to Israel next summer for the Maccabiah Games. As of last week, the team was two points out of first place in the premier division of the Hangar Sports Leagues.

Maccabi soccer draws youngsters largely from the northern part of the GTA, but Maccabi Soccer is hoping to expand its presence south of Steeles Avenue, even as far as Eglinton. The one factor holding it back is the unavailability of playing fields, Voihanski said.

So, did the 2002 team manage to teach their parents a lesson on the soccer pitch?

In the end, the game ended in a tie, keeping everyone guessing about next year's rematch.

Textbook study undercuts incitement claim

Ron Kampeas
JTA

WASHINGTON — An in-depth comparative study of Palestinian and Israeli school textbooks is offering some conclusions that already are making some Israeli government officials very unhappy: Palestinian textbooks don't have as much anti-Israel incitement as often portrayed.

While this finding might appear to be welcome news for supporters of Israel, it also threatens to undercut one of the central elements of the official Israeli narrative. For years, the charge that Palestinians "educate to hate" has been an Israeli trump card in undermining claims that Palestinian statehood is overdue.

"This obviously cuts down one of the pegs and a linchpin in the argument that the Israel government makes, that the Palestinian Authority is teaching hatred to their kids," said an official who works closely with mainstream U.S. Jewish groups, who declined to be identified because of the sensitivity of the matter.

But detractors say the study's methodology rips biased and sometimes inflammatory passages from each cultural context. They say triumphalism is more incendiary in a Palestinian society that they say is more forgiving of terrorism.

Israel criticizes methodology

Israel's Education Ministry said in a statement that "the results of the 'study' reveal that the decision not to co-operate with these bodies was right." The ministry called the study "biased, unprofessional and significantly lacking in objectivity."

Titled Victims of our own Narratives? and funded by the U.S. State Department, the study found both Israel and the Palestinians lacking in making the case for the other side's presence in the Holy Land. It also concludes Israeli textbooks are better than Palestinian ones at preparing schoolchildren for peace.

But in the same pages, it praises both Israel and the Palestinian Authority for publishing textbooks virtually free of "dehumanizing and demonizing characterizations of the other."

"Both the Israeli and Palestinian communities should be commended for this important positive aspect of their books," it says. "Extreme negative characterizations of the other of this sort are present in textbooks elsewhere in the world."

The study was launched in 2009 by the Council of Religious Institutions in the Holy Land, a multifaith body that aims "to prevent religion from being used as a source of conflict, and to promote mutual respect," its website says. It comprises the Israeli Chief Rabbinate, the Palestinian Islamic Waqf and the heads of Christian churches in Israel and the West Bank.

The Israeli government did not formally co-operate with the study, while Palestinian Authority officials did.

Yale University psychiatry professor Bruce Wexler convened the study team, which was headed by Daniel Bar Tal of Tel Aviv University and Sami Adwan of the University of Bethlehem. Hebrew-Arabic bilingual research assistants read more than 3,000 passages – 74 from Israeli texts and 96 from Palestinian ones.

They assessed the passages using criteria developed in part by an advisory panel that included Palestinian and Israeli academics and outside experts, including those who have critiqued Palestinian textbooks. Most of the panel, including several Israelis, signed a statement Feb. 3 endorsing its findings. "We agreed that the methods of the study were of the highest scientific standards and agreed on the main study findings," it said.

At least one Israeli member, Arnon Groiss, had reservations about the methodology and said he couldn't endorse the final report, which he said he hasn't seen.

It's unclear whether the study will alter fundamentally the standard Israeli narrative about Palestinian schools laying the groundwork for future conflict with Israel, and the study doesn't absolve either side.

The study found that textbooks in Israel's state schools were likelier to depict Palestinians in a positive light and to include criticism of Israeli actions, while books in Palestinian and haredi schools were overwhelmingly negative in their depiction of "the other." Critics, including some of the Israelis on the panel, said this equivalence fails to take into account how each culture responds to such depictions.

"The problem is [Wexler] makes comparisons between promotion of education for peace on the one side and education that calls for the annihilation of the other side," said Yossi Kuperwasser, director of Israel's Ministry of Strategic Affairs. Kuperwasser added that the study "omits important examples of incitement and delegitimization of Israelis and Jews in official PA textbooks, whether in an intentional attempt to blur the differences between the two educational systems or due to poor research."

TV psychotherapist draws on personal experiences

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Stacey Dombrowsky didn't know she wanted to become a therapist until she found herself facing some major life challenges.

"Growing up, I always thought that I just didn't know how to stop eating," said the 37-year-old psychoanalyst and addictions counsellor. "It was debilitating, and it disabled me."

She said her addiction to food became an obsession to the point where she wasn't able to work, and at times, she felt as though she couldn't survive with the addiction.

But then she found a miracle, she said. "I realized I have so much to offer the world – how would I overcome what I'm facing?" She sought help to work through her addiction, and eventually recovered by the time she was 32, but she said it took years and many different methods of treatment before she was able to face her own addiction.

Dombrowsky on the set of her TV show, Mind Matters.

These days, Dombrowsky has been devoting her life to helping people with their problems, partly through her own private practice in Markham, Ont., where she treats patients with a variety of issues. For example, her patients might have a drug addiction or an eating disorder, but they might also be facing depression or anxiety. Others are simply looking for support or advice about their personal or professional lives.

Over the past few months, she has expanded the number of people she can help through a weekly live call-in show on Rogers TV called Mind Matters, which she has been producing and hosting since September. On the show, she has guests – experts in different fields – and together, they answer viewers' questions based on a given theme each week.

The themes range a lot – from depression to eating disorders, and even dream analysis. Dombrowsky said she believes she has the ability to help with any of these issues partly because she has formally studied some of these areas – for example, she studied addictions at McMaster University – but also because she has experienced a similar problem firsthand.

Treating patients over the phone brings its own challenges, she said. "I don't really know them, [so] I have to use my intuition to guide them." She described the method as taking her own experiences out of the picture, and trying to find the best advice for each caller.

"I think I have mini-births and deaths every day – little transformations… I know how to get through my own challenges," she said. "Today, I understand what it means to pick myself back up and move through it rather than sit through my stuff."

Dombrowsky spoke about the power of healing through non-traditional methods. For example, she described her treatment involving "inner child work." She explained that this means she asks patients to reconnect with their childhood self and say what they think of the childhood version and what the inner child thinks of the adult version.

"You've never met this person before, but it's a part of you that's there but you didn't know was there," she said. "What comes up is they had that fear and that's how we get over the fear."

She learned some of her techniques at a Toronto school called the Transformational Arts College of Spiritual and Holistic Training. In 2011, while she was in the middle of the program, she faced what she called a near-death experience after she fell off a horse. Although she damaged her body, she said, the experience led her to become more spiritual.

"I'm way more energetically inclined now. I'm way more in touch with my body. I was always intuitive, but now it's reached another height… so I saw that as a good experience."

She said she read up on internal focusing, which taught her how to heal her own body.

"Through that experience, I can now sense what other people are experiencing in their own bodies," she said, adding that she's not saying she has the power to heal people, but rather that she can feel the energy of someone who is open to it.

Six months after her accident, she joined a team of fundraisers on a journey to climb Mount Kilimanjaro to raise money for Markham Stouffville Hospital's child and adolescent mental health clinic. She had 50 days to raise the minimum requirement of $10,000. She said her family immediately told her she was crazy to try to reach the top, especially given the remaining effects of her accident.

"But who I am is somebody who is so determined, absolutely fearless," she said. "I felt it had a purpose to it."

In the end, she was one of six team members who made it to the top.

"It's mind over matter – there was not even a question in my mind that I was not going to make it," she said, adding that the final stretch was particularly gruelling, given that they climbed in the dark.

"That's like going on a Stairmaster at level 20 with 20 pounds of bricks on your back in the dark. If I were to do it during the day, I don't think I would have done it if I could see what I was doing."

But she called it an amazing experience – though not one she plans to repeat.

Dombrowsky said it's her determination that got her through life's challenges, and she would advise anybody struggling with addiction to persevere.

"If you're afraid to see the light, that's when it doesn't happen," she said. "If you continue to look for a way through it… there's no way you can't find peace."

Mind Matters airs live Wednesdays at 8 p.m. on Rogers TV.

From trees to water

Rarely do Tu b'Shvat and Shabbat Shirah occur on the same Shabbat. But this year was an exception, and the exception led me to an exploration of the subject of trees, which led to the subject of water.

Josh Cooper, CEO of the Jewish National Fund of Canada (JNF), contacted me after reading one of my columns about water. "I bet when you think about JNF all you think about is trees, but do you know what we are doing with water?" he asked.

I had to admit, after spending so much time on the topic of water over the last few columns, I thought I had seen it all, but alas, there was more to be learned.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Many of us remember the blue boxes in Hebrew schools in which coins were collected to support the work of JNF in Israel. We may also remember various school-based campaigns to plant trees in Israel.

JNF remains active in local Jewish schools and the community today. But the message and their projects have evolved to meet the needs of Israel and to help the country deal with water in a more sustainable way.

I recently met Avri Kadmon, manager of the information unit for the Land Development Authority at JNF Israel – Keren Kayemet L'Yisrael. (KKL)

Kadmon was on a speaking tour across Canada, helping JNF-KKL get its message out about existing and expanding projects – including research and development – aimed at promoting environmental protection and helping to deal with the water problem in Israel.

He spoke to Grade 8 students at Toronto's Robbins Hebrew Academy in Toronto. They were working on a water project highlighting similarities and differences between Canada and Israel.

After going over statistics on Israeli water supply and consumption, Avri touched on the role that JNF-KKL played in pre-1948 Israel, helping establish the country by draining the swamps and reclaiming land for agricultural purposes.

Kadmon reviewed JNF-KKL's large-scale Israeli water conservation projects prior to the recent arrival of large-scale desalination plants in Israel, including building dams and reservoirs to capture rainwater run-off.

JNF-KKL realizes that a way to address Israel's water shortage is to use high-quality recycled wastewater for agriculture instead of scarce and expensive freshwater. Two hundred and fifty JNF-KKL reservoirs can now hold rain run-off and high-quality recycled wastewater. This helped increase Israel's water supply by 12 per cent, providing half of the water used by the agricultural sector, and freeing up drinking water for domestic purposes, according to the JNF website.

Israel was forced to innovate in wastewater recycling because it has a limited supply of fresh water. Today, Israel recycles 75 per cent of its sewage water. Treating wastewater prevents pollution of aquifers, streams and soil. Israel is aiming at 95 per cent recycling by 2020, and JNF-KKL is helping local and regional councils upgrade their existing wastewater treatment systems. Canada, with an abundance of fresh water, is in the low single digits for wastewater recycling.

Remember those drained swamps? JNF is now working on cutting-edge, environmentally friendly recycling technologies such as constructed wetlands. I guess the swamps have a purpose as well.

CHOCOLATE FRUIT & NUT CLUSTERS

For your Shaisch Manos

7 oz. bittersweet chocolate
2 oz. butter or margarine
10 oz. mixed dried fruit and nuts, or candied citrus peels

In a large bowl in microwave, or over a double boiler, melt chocolate and butter/margarine. Stir gently and constantly until smooth and glossy. To melted chocolate mixture, add fruit and nut mixture, mixing thoroughly to coat.

Spoon mixture into small paper cupcake cups by tablespoons, or onto a sheet lined with parchment paper. Drizzle any leftover chocolate mixture over the clusters, filling up empty spaces. Freeze clusters 1/2 hr. If making ahead of time, keep in fridge or freezer.

The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) has been named one of the best places to work in Greater Montreal, according to an annual competition to find the city's 25 top employers.

The 2013 winners were selected from more than 2,000 applicants, following a detailed review of their operations and human-resource practices. The competition, now in its ninth year, judged eight key areas: physical workplace, work and social atmosphere, health, financial and family benefits, vacation and other time off, employee communications, performance management, training and skills development, and community involvement.

The inevitability of a broken cellphone

It was difficult for the Jewish People to be disconnected from Moishe while the Jewish leader spent time on Mount Sinai with God. They had a deep sense of abandonment, and therefore constructed the Golden Calf so as to be comforted.

While a broken cellphone is not as daunting as watching your leader walk into a cloud of smoke, it can be somewhat unnerving, even traumatic.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

I am one of those people who are not particularly at home with material things. Throughout my life I have made great efforts to purchase furniture that reflects a grown-up attitude and to design my living quarters in a way that is contemporary and balanced. After many tries, I have finally succeeded in creating a welcoming and warm home, I believe, but I always feel as if I'm a step away from adulthood.

And therein lies my challenge with my cellphone. Like most of us, I began using one a few years ago for work and play. And like most of you, I slowly and so very surely became addicted to that little black electronic device, so much so that it would travel with me from room to room.

I was never alone.

Like my other material things, my BlackBerry would live hard. If I was watching a hockey game, inevitably it would slide off my 1980s Victorian-style couch, ending up on the floor, sometimes in pieces. If I was washing my heirloom dishes, this futuristic device would sit by the suds, vibrating and beeping messages to me about my life – all of which seem so crucial – and getting wet.

Now what I learned early on about the BlackBerry is that, like a cat, it does not see any liquid entity as a comrade.

Once I splashed the BlackBerry with puddles of water while taking a bath and, of course, my screen went wonky despite hours of blow-drying the little devil. Pardon my crassness, but somehow, in some way, on a day like any other, my mobile phone fell into the toilet. What does one do when faced with such a formidable scenario? Reach in, of course, and promptly dump it into a bag of rice – the theory being that it will suck the moisture out of the chips and wires that make up this highly sophisticated phone.

Does it work? Some people tell positive stories, and of course, others can only mourn the loss of a good bag of basmati.

Now that so many of us have developed such an addiction, how do we deal with the future, one in which the inevitability of loss will occur. In simpler terms, what precautions can we put into play with the knowledge that at some point, in some place, our cellphone will break, perhaps by water, or even by the sword? After many discussions with individuals who seem to have an intuitive understanding of how to care for material things, consensus is, there are none.

Like the Jewish People who simply had to watch as Moses ascended Mount Sinai, fearing he might not come back, we have to accept that something as necessary as our cellphones, which go through greater use than any other thing we own, will eventually tumble, fall, somersault, flip-flop, cartwheel and spill right off the sink into a puddle below.

While I wish I could be more hopeful, I can't. The good news is, Moishe returned with the tablets – twice.

Hundreds protest Iran-Argentina pact

JTA

BUENOS AIRES — Some 300 people attended a protest rally against Argentine-Iranian co-operation in investigating the deadly 1994 bombing of a Jewish community centre.

Among the protesters at the Feb. 14 rally, which took place outside the Holocaust Museum in the Argentine capital, were relatives of the survivors of the bombing of the AMIA Jewish community centre. Israeli and Argentine justice authorities blame Iran for the attack.

"We ask Argentine society's forgiveness for wasting a great privilege that democracy gave us," Reform Rabbi Sergio Berman, who is a lawmaker, said in a speech at the rally. "We had the first Jewish foreign minister and that is why we say sorry."

Rabbi Bergman, a member of the Buenos Aires municipal legislature, recommended the venue for the protest and debate. He noted that Iranian leaders deny the Holocaust.

Argentina's first Jewish foreign minister, Héctor Timerman, on Jan. 27 signed a memorandum with his Iranian counterpart to set up a joint "truth commission," prompting condemnations from members and leaders of Jewish communities in Latin America and beyond.

Painful memories

Family and friends attend a memorial ceremony at the grave of Ilan Halimi, at the Givat Shaul cemetery in Jerusalem. Halimi, 23, was kidnapped south of Paris in January 2006 by a group called "the Gang of Barbarians" and tortured for over a period of three weeks, resulting in his death. The murder was motivated by antisemitism and theft and heightened fears of the Jewish community in France. [Tali Mayer Flash90 photo]

Mega Aliyah Fairs

TORONTO — Toronto and Montreal will be among six North American sites for a week of "mega aliyah events" March 3 to 10 organized by Nefesh B'Nefesh with the Jewish Agency for Israel, the Jewish National Fund and Israel's Ministry of Immigrant Absorption. The other sites will be Baltimore, Washington, D.C., New York City and South Florida. The events will feature seminars and workshops, as well as personal consultations with staff from all the organizers. Representatives from various Israeli ministries, health funds, shippers, and Nefesh B'Nefesh's "Go North" and "Go South" programs will attend. Nefesh B'Nefesh has helped some 33,000 North American and British Jews make aliyah.

Ejection Probed

NEW YORK — Brooklyn College launched a probe into allegations Jewish students were wrongly ejected from an event co-sponsored by the school's political science faculty in support of the anti-Israel boycott, divestment and sanctions movement. Four Hillel members say they were escorted by security out of a lecture organized by a pro-Palestinian campus group earlier this month for no apparent reason other than being pro-Israel. They reportedly had pro-Israel leaflets with them in the lecture hall and organizers asked them to leave when they refused to give them up.

Invitation Rejected

MARSEILLE — The Marseille branch of CIMADE, a French Protestant group that saved Jews during the Holocaust, declined an invitation to the region's main memorial event for Jewish Holocaust victims because CRIF, the pro-Israel umbrella group representing French Jews, organized it with the municipality. The values that led CIMADE to save Jews make it "equally committed to oppose the colonial, discriminatory and bellicose policy of Israel with regards to the Palestinians," the group's regional deputies wrote in a letter to the local CRIF branch on Dec. 21. It also said CIMADE was determined to fight "apartheid." The letter, posted online last week by a group that promotes a boycott of Israel, was a reply to an invitation by CRIF to CIMADE to attend the 70th commemoration on Jan. 20 of the deportation and murder of thousands of local Jews. Marseille had 39,000 Jews in 1939. Only 10,000 remained after the Holocaust. Yad Vashem named Madeleine Barot, who headed CIMADE during the war, a Righteous Among the Nations in 1988. She died seven years later.

More Controversy For Ex-Dior Designer

NEW YORK — A New York Post cover story skewered John Galliano for supposedly dressing in chassidic garb for New York Fashion Week.

Galliano, the former head designer at Christian Dior who was fired after making antisemitic slurs in a Paris café, was pictured dressed in what the Post claimed was chassidic clothing aimed at mocking Orthodox dress. The photograph ran underneath the headline "Shmuck!"

John Galliano

But the Anti-Defamation League, which recently declared Galliano had rehabilitated himself after his antisemitic outburst, came to his defence, saying his dress wasn't chassidic.

"This is John Galliano being John Galliano," ADL national director Abraham Foxman, said. "His dress is always eccentric and his hair is always worn long. This is, at the very least, ignorance on the part of the reporters and editors at the Post, or, at worst, a deliberate, malicious distortion in an effort to sell newspapers."

Some Jewish figures, including Brooklyn Assemblyman Dov Hikind, found the outfit offensive. Hikind told the Post that it appeared to be mocking the Jewish community: "The way the socks look, the jacket, the peyos... My question is, who's he laughing at?"

Hungarian filmmaker fears for his children

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Hungarian Jews are fearful of how openly antisemitic and xenophobic their politicians and non-Jewish countrymen are becoming.

Some are even declaring their fear that the EU state is on the path toward an ultra-nationalistic regime bent on persecuting Jews and Roma, not unlike Germany in the early-to-mid 1930s.

The trepidation being felt by Jews, Roma and other minorities in Hungary prompted an independent Jewish-Hungarian documentary filmmaker, Adam Csillag, to start detailing his government's activities and those of the far-right wing Jobbik opposition party. He's particularly focused on efforts to limit freedom of the press and on antisemitic and anti-Roma activity over the past few years.

Adam Csillag

A recent Canadian billboard campaign in Hungary targeting would-be Roma asylum-seekers to Canada with the message that new immigration laws severely limit their ability to seek refuge from persecution here led Csillag to contact The CJN to alert Canada's Jewish community to the situation in his country.

Hungary is on Canada's designated "safe countries" list of democratic nations that it deems to have adequate legal and institutional protection for their citizens.

Csillag said there are legitimate reasons for Roma, and perhaps soon Jews, to seek asylum elsewhere.

"Hungary is lying to Canadian politicians when it says it is democratic," he said. "Jobbik and its paramilitary [groups] are doing terrible things to Roma. I witnessed serial killings of Roma in 2008. The police are against the Roma."

In a recent phone interview from his home in Budapest, with his daughter Anna translating, he said public discourse in Hungary has reached the point where "a disturbing amount" of people are unabashed about insulting minorities, particularly Jews and Roma.

He said he's now advising his daughter and all Jewish youth in Hungary to leave for their own safety and a better future.

Anna, who is half-Jewish on her father's side, confirmed that for the past few years while attending university, her friends and classmates have never been shy about telling her how much they like her "despite" her heritage.

Beyond that, Csillag said, many politicians in both the ruling Fidesz party – led by Prime Minister Viktor Orban – and Jobbik share similar ideas regarding foreigners and minorities on Hungarian soil.

The time had come for my wife's unveiling. My kids and I wanted a monument that honoured her memory and captured who she was. A stone of lasting beauty, so that when we visited her grave, we felt close to her. The monument counsellor at Benjamin's Landmark designed a custom stone at a price we could afford. They truly took the utmost care.

Iran's deadly tentacles

Most of the world was shaken last week by the news that North Korea had tested a nuclear device deep underground in the northern part of its country. The test caused alarms to sound in government halls around the world, not only in the West. There is a gnawing certainty that North Korean belligerence is dangerous for the entire globe. China, for example, whose border is not far from the site of the nuclear test, and which usually provides diplomatic cover for its southern neighbour, was among the first countries to condemn the North Koreans.

From the editor's desk...

But there was another unsettling aspect of the North Korean test that did not evoke as many alarms – but should have. The North Koreans may have also conducted the test on behalf of the Iranians.

According to Alon Levkowitz, coordinator of Bar-Ilan University's Asian studies program and a member of the BESA Center for Strategic Studies, "the most disturbing question [about the test explosion] is whether the Iranians are using North Korea as a backdoor plan for their own nuclear program. The Iranians didn't carry out a nuclear test in Iran, but they may have done so in North Korea. There is no official information on this... but Iran may have bypassed inspections via North Korea. If true, this is a very worrying development," Levkowitz told the Jerusalem Post.

The spectre of Iranian involvement with the North Koreans, however, is only a small portion – albeit very worrisome – of the dark shadow cast by the theocratic rulers of Tehran over large parts of the world.

In an essay published last week in the Wall Street Journal, Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, chillingly pointed out Iran's deadly reach.

"In 25 cities across five continents, community centres, consulates, army barracks and houses of worship have been targeted for destruction. Thousands have been killed. The perpetrators are agents of Hezbollah and the Quds Force, sometimes operating separately and occasionally in unison. All take their orders from Tehran."

Oren provided a grisly inventory of the Iranian-inspired, planned, funded, and sometimes directed, slaughter.

Two weeks ago, Bulgarian security forces revealed that Hezbollah agents were the perpetrators of the Bourgas Airport attack last summer in which five Israelis and one Bulgarian were killed.

And as we know all too sadly, Iranian operatives were responsible for the murder of 115 Jews nearly two decades ago when the AMIA Jewish community centre and the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires, Argentina, were bombed.

Oren points out that Hezbollah has been tied to drug smuggling in Africa, the Middle East and Europe. In addition, another Iranian surrogate – the Quds Force – was part of the failed plot by the infamous Mexican Los Zetas drug cartel to assassinate a Saudi diplomat in Washington.

As well, "U.S. authorities have implicated Hezbollah in the sale of contraband cigarettes in North Carolina, and Iran has manufactured and sold millions of rounds of ammunition to warring armies in Africa. So while skirting western sanctions, Iran funds terror worldwide."

Western security forces know that Iran has imprinted its inky black mark essentially in every continent.

But it is much closer to Israel's doorstep where it stains its death the deepest.

Despite the multi-cleric parliament of Lebanon, the country is effectively in the grip of the Supreme Leader of Iran, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Hezbollah is Iran's vanguard in south Lebanon.

As reported last week by Israeli analyst Ron Ben Yishai, "some 180 Shiite villages and small towns situated between the Zahrani River and the border with Israel have been converted into fighting zones in which Hezbollah is preparing – above and below ground – for the next conflict with Israel. Hezbollah has some 65,000 rockets and missiles at its disposal."

And despite its once former fierce independence, Syria too, has now become nothing more than a modern version of a biblical Persian satrapy. Without Iranian intervention, the Syrian strongman would have abdicated long ago, or been killed.

And what is the price that the Syrian people are paying for Iran's protection of their president?

As reported last week by the Times of Israel, UN human rights chief Navi Pillay disclosed that the number of people killed in Syria's civil war is probably approaching 70,000. Now there are reports that the figure may be closer to 90,000. As if to prove her mettle, Pillay added that the UN human rights council's deep division and inaction over the Syrian conflict "has been disastrous, and civilians on all sides have paid the price." Really.

Korea, Argentina, Bulgaria, Lebanon, Syria – Iran's tentacles are far-reaching and blood-soaked. At our peril, many in the West – especially in the European Union – ignore that reach even as it attempts to grasp further.

Israel's Jewishness has declined, demographer says

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel's Jewish population, when compared to its non-Jewish population, has been on a steady decline since the late 1950s, says Israeli demographer Sergio DellaPergola.

Jews in Israel represented 89.2 per cent of its population in 1957 and 84.5 per cent in 1977. Today, however, the figure is 75.3 per cent, he said in a lecture last week at the Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto.

By contrast, Israel's Arab population has correspondingly risen, from 10.8 per cent and 15.5 per cent in 1957 and 1977, to 20.7 per cent today, he noted.

Last year, Jews living between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea represented 52 per cent of a heterogeneous population consisting of Arabs and foreign workers, he pointed out.

DellaPergola, a professor emeritus of population studies at Hebrew University, is a widely acknowledged expert in Jewish demographics.

Almost three years ago, he told the Jerusalem Post that Jews no longer constitute a majority of the population in this area when Israeli Arabs, Palestinian Arabs, foreign workers and African refugees are factored into the equation.

His projections, based on the assumption that the Arab birthrate will continue to outstrip the Jewish birthrate, have raised concerns that Israel's future as a democratic Jewish state will be imperilled by the imperative of demography.

According to DellaPergola, the Jewish birthrate in Israel is significantly lower than that of its minority of 1.6 million Arabs.

For every 20.8 Jewish births per thousand, there are 24.7 Arab births per thousand, he said.

And because the Arab community has a younger population on average, the death rate in the Jewish sector is higher, he added.

Within Israel's Jewish community, haredim have the highest birthrate, he said, noting they're expected to comprise one-third of its Jewish population by 2049, compared to 10 per cent today.

In Israel, 24.1 per cent of Jews define themselves by religion, while 42.5 per cent define themselves by nationality and ethnicity. The remaining 29.8 percent identify themselves by citizenship.

Israeli Arabs define themselves mainly by religion (47.6 per cent), with 25.9 per cent identifying themselves by nationality and ethnicity and 24.1 per cent by citizenship.

Peering into the future, DellaPergola, a former adviser to the Israeli government and the president of Israel, suggested that Israel faces stark choices concerning its religious and ethnic composition. If the West Bank is retained, Israel will likely become a Jewish and non-democratic state, he said.

Alternatively, Israel can morph into a democratic and non-Jewish state.

Listing a third scenario, he said that Israel can remain Jewish and democratic without the West Bank.

Without explicitly saying so, DellaPergola implied that Israel can only continue to function as a democratic Jewish state if it withdraws from the West Bank, whose Arab population is estimated to be 2.6 million.

With more than six million Jews living in the Jewish state today, he went on to say, Israel has the world's largest Jewish population.

Immigration has been the "major engine" for its rapidly expanding Jewish population, said DellaPergola, who was born in Italy in 1942 and immigrated to Israel in 1966.

The United States, with some 5.7 million Jews, ranks just behind Israel in terms of the number of Jews in its population.

More than 80 per cent of the 14 million Jews in the world can be found in Israel and the United States, he said.

In his view, there is a demonstrable correlation between a nation's development and the size of its Jewish population. A more developed country has more Jews, he said.

Today, most Jews live in "first-world" democracies, but a century ago, they resided in underdeveloped societies in eastern Europe and the Muslim world.

During a question-and-answer session, DellaPergola admitted his data has been challenged.

Critics, such as former Israeli diplomat Yoram Ettinger, claim that official Palestinian population figures suffer from empirical and methodological deficiencies.

Still others contend that millions of new Jewish immigrants will pour into Israel in the future and thereby dispel fears that Israeli Jews will become a minority in their own land.

DellaPergola said he does not share these views.
